expressly foretold by the ancient prophets; (Notes, Ps. 16:8—11. 22:22—31. Is. 53:9—12. Luke 24:44—49. Acts 2:25—32. 13:24—27.) and even the enemies of our Lord knew that he had clearly predicted it, and the very time when it would take place. (Note, Matt. 27:62—66.) Accordingly, on the day prefixed the body was gone, after all the precautions which those who had procured his crucifixion had taken to secure it: and though their authority and reputation were in every respect at stake; though they could give no rational account what was become of it; and though they had the whole authority in their hands; they never ventured to bring, either the soldiers who guarded the sepulchre, or the apostles who were said to have stolen the body, to any trial; but chose rather to sit down under the imputation of the basest murder, prevarication, and wickedness, than excite any further inquiry into the transaction. The eleven apostles, (to whom a twelfth was shortly after added,) were a sufficient number of witnesses: they were men of plain sense and irreproachable characters; they had been constant attendants on Jesus during some years, and could not but know him, and they unanimously testified, that they repeatedly saw him, conversed, ate, and drank with him, after his resurrection; that they examined the wounds in his hands and side; and that at length they beheld him ascend towards heaven, till a cloud intercepted their view of him. In this testimony they persisted as with one voice during a series of years; and nothing induced any one of them to vary from it, in the smallest particular. It is evident that they had no previous expectation of the resurrection of their Lord; and, notwithstanding all the miracles which they had witnessed, they were remarkably incredulous about it. They were also exceedingly intimidated by his crucifixion; and they could have no possible temporal motive, to invent and propagate a report of his resurrection; for labour, poverty, reproach, imprisonment, suffering, and death alone could be expected, as their recompense, for thus embracing the cause of one who had been crucified as a deceiver. In every thing else, they appeared to be the most simple, upright, holy, and pious men in the world: yet if in this they falsified; they must have been the most wicked and most artful persons who ever existed, and that without any prospect of advantage. For they spent all the rest of their lives in propagating the religion of Jesus, as risen from the dead; renouncing every worldly interest; facing opposition and persecution; enduring all kinds of hardship; prepared at all times to seal their testimony with their blood; and most of them actually suffering martyrdom in the cause, confirming their testimony with their latest breath, and leaving it in their writings as a most valuable bequest to posterity.—Moreover, there were other competent witnesses, who saw Jesus after his resurrection, even to the number of five hundred persons: (Note, 1 Cor. 15:3—11, v. 6.) these also concurred in the same testimony to their latest breath; and neither terror, nor hope, nor any other motive, ever induced one of them to contradict or dissent from the testimony of the others. If we were to stop here, we could scarcely conceive of a more complete human testimony to any matter of fact. Yet perhaps some may think, that if Jesus had openly appeared after his resurrection to the Jewish nation and their rulers, it might have put the matter beyond all doubt: but it should be considered, that if this measure had been adopted, and the rulers had persisted in rejecting him, as they certainly would, if their hearts had remained unchanged; (Note, Luke 16:27—31.) the gospel would have had still greater disadvantages to encounter, both among the other Jews, and the Gentiles. On the other hand, if the whole Jewish nation and their rulers had received Jesus as the Messiah, when the gospel had been sent among the Gentiles, it would have appeared as a plan formed for aggrandizing that nation, and as such would probably have been disregarded; and after all, they who lived in after ages could have no further proof of this public appearance, than the testimony of those individuals who recorded it. In short, if our Lord was not to give ocular demonstration of this resurrection to every man, in every age; (which would have been impossible;) the number of competent witnesses was sufficient, and even preferable to a greater multitude.—But, as if all human testimony was a small matter, in such an infinitely important concern, God himself was pleased to bear witness with the apostles, in a most extraordinary manner; conferring upon them the gifts of tongues and of working miracles, by the Holy Spirit; and enabling them to impart the same to others by the laying on of their hands. (Notes, 15:26,27. Acts 8:18—24. Heb. 2:1—4, v. 4.) Thus the number of unexceptionable witnesses was increased; the testimony to our Lord's resurrection was diffused on every side; and his most inveterate enemies could not deny that most extraordinary miracles were performed by those who attested that event. (Note, Acts 4:13—22, v. 16.) In this manner, the number of the disciples of Jesus was speedily multiplied, by tens of thousands being converted from among those who had just before demanded his crucifixion: and Christianity got ground rapidly on every side, in opposition to all the wealth, power, learning, superstition, and philosophy of the world; and by unarmed, unlearned, poor, and despised instruments: till at length whole nations embraced the religion of the crucified Nazarene, as the prophets had expressly foretold. (Notes, Jer. 16:19—21. Am. 9:11,12. Zech. 8:20—23.) This effect, which could be ascribed to no power but that of God, and the continuance of so humbling and holy a religion in the world to this day, form a demonstration even to us of this important fact: nor has any past event since the beginning of the world ever been proved, with such complicated and abundant evidence.—St. Paul's conversion, and the prophecies contained in the writings of those who testified our Lord's resurrection, and which have been accomplishing for almost eighteen hundred years, may be considered as additional complete divine attestations. (Notes, Acts 9:31. 2 Thes. 2:3—12. 1 Tim. 4:1—5. Preface to the Revelation of St. John.)

V. 30, 31. (Marg. Ref. Note, 21:24,25.) "The signs" here spoken of, seems to refer to the evidences of our Lord's resurrection, of which there were far more than it was necessary to record: (Note, Acts 1:1—3.) but these were committed to writing, in order that all those who should ever read them, might believe that Jesus was indeed the promised "Messiah," the King of Israel, the Saviour of sinners, and "the Son of God;" that by this faith they might obtain eternal life, through his name, for his sake, and by his mercy, truth, and power. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. They who love the Lord will seek him early and diligently; and, notwithstanding all sorrows, delays, misapprehensions, and discouragements, they will assuredly find him.—External forms and empty notions will no more satisfy the earnest trembling inquirer after salvation, than the sepulchre and the grave-clothes did Mary and the apostles, who sought the Lord Jesus in faith and love.—Under a large proportion of preaching, by men called Christian ministers, we are ready to say, "They have taken away the Lord, and we know not where they have laid him;" but the broken-hearted disciple cannot be thus contented, though others be filled with admiration of the preacher's eloquence, genius, or learning.—Those who are equally in earnest do not always make equal progress: some men take things more quickly, others investigate more deeply: and they may be mutually helpful in bringing each other to understand the Scripture, and to establishment in the faith. (Notes, Rom. 12:3—8. 1 Cor. 12:12—26. Eph. 4:11—16.)

V. 11—23. Great love is manifested by proportionable sorrow, when the beloved object is removed: thus the humble believer mourns, when he seeks in vain for the comfort of the Redeemer's presence, or the opportunity of honouring him. At such times, he is apt to imagine that others, as well as himself, must be thinking of his beloved: and the same state of mind often incapacitates him from perceiving the evidences of the Lord's love to him, or the grounds of his own consolation. Thus he is led to weep, when he should rejoice: but mourners of this character shall be comforted; (Note, Matt. 5:4.) angels rejoice over them, and are ready to minister to their comfort; Jesus will "manifest himself to them, as he doth not unto the world;" and in this manner the most disconsolate penitents, and the chief of sinners, become the messengers of peace and comfort to others also.—Our gracious Redeemer, in his highest exaltation, deigns to call his disciples brethren, notwithstanding all their falls and ingratitude! and when we consider how low he stooped, and how much he suffered, in order to form the relation and to fulfil the part of a Brother to us sinful worms; we shall not hesitate to expect the greatest honour and felicity from him. (P. O. Heb. 2:5—18.) He has "ascended to his Father and our Father, to his God and our God;" and there he continually manages all our concerns, with the most perfect love and faithfulness: yet when we assemble in his name, especially on his holy day, he will meet with us and speak peace to us; (Notes, Matt. 18:19,20. 28:19,20.) he will assure us of his forgiveness; counterbalance our sorrows and alarms from persecuting foes; and communicate his sacred Spirit of life, love, holiness, and consolation; according as our services, or our difficulties, require his special assistances, supports, and influences.

V. 24—31. When disciples are needlessly absent from the assemblies of God's people, they will surely be losers; and their unbelieving fears and sorrows are often prolonged, as a chastisement for their negligence. (Note, Heb. 10:23—25.) Indeed, unbelief is the source of almost all our sins and disquietudes. We all have too much copied the example of Thomas's incredulity, by refusing to believe the word of God, and to rely on his help, even when our past experience of his care has been abundant; and we are often apt to demand such proof of his truths, and of his will respecting us, as we have no right to expect. But he does not deal with us after our iniquities, and therefore "we are not consumed." He knows all our difficulties and temptations, he rebukes and obviates the unbelief of those whose hearts are upright before him.

CHAPTER XXI.

Jesus appears to some of his disciples, at the sea of Tiberias; makes himself known by a miraculous draught of fishes; and eats with them, 1–14. He thrice demands of Peter, whether he loves him; and thrice requires him to show his love, by feeding his lambs and sheep, 15–17. He foretells Peter's martyrdom, commanding him to follow him, 18, 19; and reproves his curiosity concerning John, who showed his readiness in the same way to follow him. 20–23. The truth of John's testimony affirmed; and it is stated that Jesus did many miracles besides, even too numerous to be all recorded, 24, 25.

AFTER [a]these things [b]Jesus showed himself again to the disciples at [c]the sea of Tiberias: and on this wise showed he himself.

2 There were together Simon Peter, [d]and Thomas called Didymus, [e]and Nathanael [f]of Cana in Galilee, [g]and the sons of Zebedee, and two other of his disciples.

3 Simon Peter saith unto them, [h]I go a fishing. They say unto him, We also go with thee. They went forth, and entered into a ship immediately; [i]and that night they caught nothing.

4 But when the morning was now come, Jesus stood on the shore; [k]but the disciples knew not that it was Jesus.

5 Then Jesus saith unto them, [l]Children, [m]have ye any meat? They answered him, No.

6 And he said unto them, [n]Cast the net on the right side of the ship, and ye shall find. [o]They cast therefore; and now they were not able to draw it for [p]the multitude of fishes.

7 Therefore [q]that disciple whom Jesus loved saith unto Peter, [r]It is the Lord. Now, [s]when Simon Peter heard that it was the Lord, he girt his fisher's coat unto him, (for he was naked,) and did cast himself into the sea.

8 And the other disciples came in a little ship, (for they were not far from land, but as it were two hundred [t]cubits,) dragging the net with fishes.

9 As soon then as they were come to land, [u]they saw a fire of coals there, and fish laid thereon, and bread.

10 Jesus saith unto them, Bring of the fish which ye have now caught.

11 Simon Peter went up, and drew the net to land full of great fishes, a hundred and fifty and three; [v]and for all there were so many, yet was not the net broken.

12 Jesus saith unto them, Come, and dine. And none of the disciples [x]durst ask him, Who art thou? knowing that it was the Lord.

13 Jesus [y]then cometh, and taketh bread, and giveth them, and fish likewise.

14 This is now [z]the third time that Jesus showed himself to his disciples after that he was risen from the dead. [Practical Observations.]

15 ¶ So, when they had dined, Jesus saith to Simon Peter, Simon, [a]son of Jonas, [b]lovest thou me [c]more than these? He saith unto him, Yea, Lord; [d]thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, [e]Feed my [f]lambs.

16 He saith unto him again [g]the second time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? He saith unto him, Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee. He saith unto him, Feed my [h]sheep.

17 He saith unto him [i]the third time, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me? Peter was [k]grieved he will convince them who he is, and what he has done for them; that they may trust, love, and obey him as "their Lord and their God." We have not indeed that kind of ocular proof, with which Thomas was favoured, and which infidels still demand; yet we are equally within the reach of the blessing. We have abundant evidence of the Redeemer's resurrection and glory: some of us, like Thomas, have withheld our credence, till we could no longer "be faithless," but were constrained to believe: and these things were written for the benefit of every reader, "that he may believe that Jesus is the Christ, and that believing he may have life through his name."

NOTES.—CHAP. XXI. V. 1—14. This transaction seems to have occurred, after the disciples had returned into Galilee; and before Jesus had met them on the mountain, according to his appointment. (Notes, Matt. 28:9,10,16,17.) —Peter being unemployed, and perhaps in want, proposed to "go a fishing," and his brethren agreed to accompany him: (Marg. Ref. a—h.) but, though they laboured during the whole night, the most proper time for fishing, they were entirely unsuccessful. This was a trial of their faith and patience; and also an emblem of the discouragements which the most able, faithful, and laborious ministers often meet with in their work. (P. O. Luke 5:1—15, vv. 3—11.) In the morning Jesus stood by the shore, near to the vessel, but he was pleased by some means to prevent their knowing him. (Marg. Ref. k.) But when they drew near to land, he accosted them as a stranger, in a very friendly and familiar manner; and asked them whether they had any meat. This might be understood either with reference to their success in fishing, or as an inquiry whether they had any provisions to dispose of. When they had answered in the negative, he directed them to cast the net on the "right side of the ship," and then they would succeed better: and though he appeared as a stranger, and they, being weary with toiling all night, had probably desisted from fishing; yet they followed his directions; and at once inclosed so many fishes, that they were not able to draw the net into the vessel again. This unexpected success convinced John that it was "The Lord;" (see on 20:2.) for probably it brought a former miracle of this kind to his remembrance. (Note, Luke 5:1—11.) As soon as he had informed Peter of this, the latter, full of love and gratitude to Jesus, who had so graciously forgiven his late base denial of him, entirely disregarded the net and the fishes; and girding on his upper garment, (having been stripped for his work,) he leaped into the sea, and swam to shore, as they were not much above a hundred yards distant from it: but the other disciples abode in the vessel to draw the net to land. When this was done, they found that Jesus had already made preparation for their refreshment, after the labour of the night, probably by miracle: but he ordered them to bring also of the fishes which they had then taken: and in doing this they found a great number of very large fishes: yet the net was wonderfully preserved from being broken; and most likely it was borrowed. (Note, and P. O. 2 Kings 6:1—7.) This draught of fishes might be sold for a considerable sum of money, which the apostles would have occasion for, on their return to Jerusalem, before the day of Pentecost.—After they had secured the fishes, Jesus called them to come and partake of the repast prepared for them; and, in his usual manner, he took the provisions, and gave unto them: but they ventured not to ask him who he was, being satisfied it was the Lord, though he probably assumed for a time a different appearance than usual. (Marg. Ref. m—z.)—This was the third time that he showed himself after his resurrection, to several of his disciples at once; for he had twice come among them at Jerusalem, when they were met together on the evening of the first day of the week. (Notes, 20:19—29.)—It does not become us to inquire where or how he spent the rest of his time previously to his ascension.—Nathanael. (2) Note, 1:47—51.—It appears here, that Cana had been Nathanael's general residence.—Dine. (12) The ancients used to make two principal stated meals; the first of which is generally called dinner, and the latter supper, in translating the Greek and Latin writers into English; and, I believe, the same method prevails in rendering them into most other modern languages. The first meal was indeed commonly taken much earlier than the dining hours at present. Thus our forefathers used to dine at eleven and sup at five: yet that has not altered the name of the meals.

V. 15—17. The case of Peter required a more marked notice, than that of the other apostles, in order that both he and others might derive the greater benefit from his fall and recovery. (Notes, Matt. 26:40,41,69—75.) Our Lord, therefore, on this occasion addressed him by his original name, as if he had forfeited that of Peter through his instability (Note, because he said unto him the third time, Lovest thou me? And he said unto him, [l]Lord, thou knowest all things; [m]thou knowest that I love thee. Jesus saith unto him, [n]Feed my sheep.

18 Verily, verily, I say unto thee, When thou wast young, thou girdest thyself, and walkedst whither thou wouldest: [o]but when thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither [p]thou wouldest not.

19 This spake he, signifying [q]by what death he should glorify God. And when he had spoken this, he saith unto him, [r]Follow me.

21 Peter seeing him saith to Jesus, [u]Lord, and what shall this man do?

22 Jesus saith unto him, [x]If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? follow thou me.

23 Then went this saying abroad among the brethren, that that disciple should not die: yet Jesus said not unto him, He shall not die; but, If I will that he tarry till I come, [y]what is that to thee?

1:35—42, vv. 41,42.) saying, "Lovest thou me more than these?" The latter clause might be interpreted of his employment and gains as a fisherman, and be considered as a demand, whether he loved Jesus above all his secular interests: (Notes, Matt. 10:37—42. Luke 14:25—27.) but Peter's answer determines us to another interpretation. He had, before his fall, in effect, said that he loved his Lord more than any of the other disciples did; for he had boasted, that "though all men were offended yet would not he." (Marg. Ref. b, c. Note, Matt. 36:30—35.) And Jesus now asked him, whether he would stand to this, and aver that he loved him more than the disciples then present did. To this he answered modestly, by saying, "Thou knowest that I love thee;" without professing to love him more than the others. Our Lord therefore renewed his appointment to the ministerial and apostolical office, at the same time commanding him "to feed his lambs," even the least of them. This intimated to him, that his late experience of his own weakness ought to render him peculiarly condescending, compassionate, tender, and attentive to the meanest and feeblest believers; and to such as were harassed with temptations, or overtaken with a fault, or who manifested many and great infirmities: as the shepherd takes the greatest care of the most weak and sickly lambs of his flock. (Marg. Ref. e, f. Notes, Is. 40:9—11. Ez. 34:2—6,11—16. Luke 22:31—34, v. 34.)—Soon after our Lord repeated his question: but as Peter had dropped the latter part of it, he urged that no further; which proves the interpretation above given to be the true one: for that is not true love of Christ which is not decidedly superior to our love of earthly things. When Peter had again appealed to him, that he knew he really did love him: Jesus ordered him to show that love, by "feeding his sheep;" or by diligently labouring to promote the edification of every description of believers, as well as to spread the knowledge of his salvation in the world. (Marg. Ref. g, h, n. Notes, 14:15—17,21—24. Acts 20:28. 2 Cor. 5:13—15.)—But, as Peter had thrice denied Christ; so he was pleased to repeat the same question "a third time:" this grieved Peter, as it reminded him that he had given sufficient cause for being thus repeatedly questioned concerning the sincerity of his love to his Lord. (Marg. Ref. i, k. Note, 2 Cor. 8:6—9.) Conscious, however, of his integrity, he more solemnly appealed to Christ, as knowing all things, even the secrets of his heart, (Marg. Ref. l, m. Note, 2:23—25.) that he knew he loved him with cordial affection, notwithstanding the grievous inconsistency of his late behaviour. Our Lord then tacitly allowed the truth of this profession, and renewed his charge to him "to feed his sheep."—Two different words (ἀγαπαω, and φιλεω,) are used in the original, for to love. The evangelist twice employs the former, in the question proposed by our Lord, but the latter in Peter's answer; which is also used in the third instance, both in the question and answer. Learned men vary in opinion, concerning the precise difference between these words: but the former seems to denote a more intense affection than the latter.—The arguments of the papists for the supremacy of the pope, from this passage, only prove their cause to be desperate, as to scriptural argument: such a pre-eminence, however, as is here described, would not greatly suit the inclinations of those who are most deeply interested in the controversy. To be more abundantly laborious in feeding the weakest of Christ's flock with the wholesome food of his pure doctrine, from love to him and his cause; to submit to any abasement or hardship, and to face any peril or persecution, in this work of compassion and tender care to the poor, the tempted, and afflicted;—this is a pre-eminence, which excites the ambition of very few, compared with the number of those who aspire after ecclesiastical authority and distinction. (Note, Matt. 18:1—4. P. O. 1-6. Note, Mark 9:33—37, v. 35.) It is indeed true that one of the words here translated feed, may be rendered rule; but then it is the rule of a careful shepherd over his valued flock: and very different from that of those, who, both in opposition to Peter's example and exhortation, have pretended to derive authority from him, "to Lord it over God's heritage." (Note, 1 Pet. 5:1—4.)

V. 18—23. Peter had earnestly professed his readiness to die with Christ; yet had shamefully failed, when put to the trial: (Note, 13:36—38.) but our Lord next assured him, that he would at length be called on, and enabled, to perform that engagement. In his youth, he had been used to gird himself, (as he had just before girded on his fisher's coat,) and to walk at liberty as he pleased: but in his old age, he would be compelled to stretch out his hands, that others might bind him, and carry him to endure those sufferings, "which he would not:" and to which nature must be reluctant. This, we are told, signified the death, by which he would "glorify God," as a martyr for his truth. (Marg. Ref. p, q. Note, 12:27—33.)—It is generally agreed that Peter was crucified nearly forty years after this; but the circumstances of it are variously related. (Note, 2 Pet. 1:12—15.)—Jesus next called upon him to signify his readiness to adhere to his cause even unto death, by rising up and following him; with which Peter complied without hesitation. (Marg. Ref. r.) But, turning about, he saw John also, (Marg. Ref. s, t,) without any command silently expressing by his conduct the same willingness to suffer death for the sake, and after the example, of his beloved Lord: and this led Peter to inquire, "What shall this man do?" 'Was he also to be a martyr?' To this our Lord replied, that if it were his will he should abide on earth till his coming, that was no concern of Peter's, who ought not to indulge a vain curiosity, but to follow him: as a token of his readiness to adhere to his instructions, to obey his commandments, to copy his example, and to suffer for his sake. (Marg. Ref. u, y. Note, Deut. 29:29.) The crucifixion of Jesus, followed by the glorious resurrection, seems to have elevated the minds of the apostles; and rendered them far more superior to the fear of men, and far more raised to the hopes and prospects of heavenly glory, even before the descent of the Holy Spirit, than they had been before.—It is most probable, that Jesus meant his coming in power to set up his kingdom, and to execute vengeance on the unbelieving Jewish nation: but the disciples had confused and defective views of this subject, and supposed he meant, that John would live till Christ came to judgment, or that he would at length be translated to heaven, as Enoch and Elijah had been: or that, being the beloved disciple, he would escape death: but the words had no such meaning.—John lived long after the destruction of Jerusalem, and after the other apostles; and, it is probable, died a natural death in extreme old age. (Preface to this gospel. Note, Rev. 1:9—11.)

Should not die. (23) Ουκ αποθνησκει. "Dieth not."

V. 24, 25. We are here informed that the beloved disciple John was the writer of this gospel: and some think that it was sanctioned, as of divine authority, by the elders of the churches of Asia; because it is added "We know that his testimony is true:" but perhaps it only means the consciousness and assured confidence of John, and the other sacred writers, of their own divine inspiration, and the infallible truth of their testimony.—(Notes, 19:31—37, v. 35. 1 John 4:4—6. 5:19—21. 3 John 9—12.) To this it is subjoined, that the actions of Jesus, which were worthy of observation, were exceedingly more numerous; and that but a small part had actually been committed to writing. The concluding words are generally understood to be highly hyperbolical: but perhaps they also intimate, that if every one of the actions and words of Jesus had been written, the books containing them would have been so voluminous, as to counteract their own intention; for men in the present state of the world, would neither be able to purchase, peruse, "remember them: and the men of the world would have even made the multiplicity of them an additional reason for not receiving them.—To the whole, the evangelist affixes "Amen," as a confirmation of what he had written and to express his approbation of the divine conduct in this and in every other particular.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14. Our blessed Lord is often near us, as to his providential care and his spiritual consolations, when we are ready to conclude that he is far off. He does not allow his ministers to "entangle themselves with the affairs of this life," or his people to perplex themselves with worldly cares: but he approves of honest industry, and vouchsafes his special presence and blessing to those who conscientiously attend to their present duty. While he provides for the souls of his disciples, he kindly inquires into their temporal wants, and allows them to state them to him, as children to a loving Father: and he will always be mindful to provide for them such "things as are needful."—None of our labours can prosper without his blessing, which we ought to seek in all our undertakings: (Note, Prov. 3:5,6.) but our dependence on him is peculiarly to be recognized in performing the work of the ministry: and he often permits his servants to labour for a time without visible success; to prove their faith and patience, to render them more observant of his directions, or more simply dependent on his assistance; and that their usefulness, when vouchsafed, may more evidently appear to be his work.

V. 15—17. It is a very blessed effect, when our falls and mistakes render us more humble, watchful, and zealous.—Our gracious Lord will readily pardon the sins of his believing servants: but he will rebuke them, in one way or other; that they may be more sensible how greatly he abhors their offences, notwithstanding his tender mercy to their souls. "The sincerity of our love" to him must at length be brought to the test; and it behooves us to inquire seriously, and with earnest and persevering prayer to the heart-searching God, to examine and prove us, whether we be able to stand this test: for he says to us, in his word, as certainly as he did to Peter, "Lovest thou me?" and the same will be the grand subject of inquiry at the solemn day of judgment. (Notes, Matt. 25:31—46. 1 Cor. 16:21—24. Eph. 6:21—24.) If we indeed love him; his perfections, his truths, his precepts, and his ordinances, will be cordially approved, received, and observed by us; we shall love those most, who appear most to love and resemble him; we shall render him our thankful returns for his unspeakable mercies, and endeavour to recommend him to those around us: we shall take pleasure in speaking of him or to him, in hearing him praised, and in promoting his glory; we shall be ready to labour, venture, or suffer for his sake: yet after all we shall be grieved and ashamed, that we love him no more, and serve him no better. We shall imitate his example, and be gradually conformed to his image: yet it will be humiliating and afflicting to us, that we so little resemble him. Those who thus "love the Lord Jesus in sincerity," have a consciousness of it, notwithstanding all their defects: and, as they believe and are assured that "he knoweth all things," and especially that he knows whether they love him or not; they will apply to him to determine the question for them, and to enable them to love him, (and that more and more,) when they cannot confidently aver that they do.—As obedience is the general evidence of our love to Jesus, so the love of his poor, afflicted, and despised people, for his sake, and an endeavour to be useful to the meanest of his flock, is that particular expression which he requires of every one. No man, therefore, can be qualified to "feed the lambs and sheep" of Christ, who does not love the good Shepherd more than all secular emolument and preferment: and all those professed ministers of Christ, without distinction of rank and station, who are too ambitious, haughty, slothful, delicate, studious of human learning, or occupied in worldly pursuits and pleasures, to apply themselves earnestly to feed the souls of the people, even the weakest and poorest of them, with the truth and instructions of God's word, will be left under an awful condemnation, as utterly destitute of the love of Christ.—Those who have been greatly tempted, and have had much humiliating experience of their own frailty and sinfulness, and who have had much forgiven them; generally prove the most tender, compassionate, and attentive pastors of weak, bruised, and trembling believers, and the best guides of young converts: and the Lord often leaves those whom he loves to pass through many painful conflicts with temptation and in-dwelling sin, as well as much experience of his tender compassion, in order to render them more gentle to their weak brethren, and to the lambs of his flock. Thus, when they feel their unworthiness for the least or meanest employment in his service, they become far abler ministers than they were when they had a much higher opinion of themselves, and of their qualifications for the ministry; and were disposed to look down on those whom they now "in honour prefer," and look up to.

V. 18—25. The resolutions which upright young converts rashly form and break, are sometimes at length performed, when in a course of years they have been humbled and proved. They must first learn, that "without Christ they can do nothing;" and then they will be shown, that they "can do all things through him who strengtheneth them." (Notes, 2 Cor. 2:14—17. 3:4—6. 12:7—10.) Yet sufferings, pain, and death will appear formidable to the most experienced Christian: nor would he be willing to meet them, did he not hope to glorify God by so doing; and were he not desirous of leaving a sinful world, that he may be present with his beloved Lord. (Note, 2 Cor. 5:1—8.) But with these objects presented to his faith, he becomes ready to obey the Redeemer's call, and to follow him through death to glory; and the more love he had experienced, the readier will he be to tread in his steps.—Curiosity is too apt to interrupt us in our course: a thousand questions are started and discussed, about which Jesus, as it were, says to us, "What is that to thee? Follow thou me." If we attend to this voice, even "death itself will be gain to us," and we shall be ready for his coming: (Phil. 1:19—26.) and while here, we must live by faith in the sure testimony of his word, which never fails those who trust in it. We ought to bless God for all that is written in the Scriptures; but we may also be thankful that they are so compendious. It would not suit our situation, our engagements in this life, or our capacities, to have a more copious revelation; and we want no uncertain traditions, or human additions, and should most decidedly protest against them. (Note, Col. 2:8—10.) We may, however, anticipate in imagination the joy which we shall receive in heaven, from a far more complete knowledge of all that Jesus did and said; as well as from the conduct of his providence and grace, in his dealings with each of us.—May this be the happiness of the writer, and of every reader! Amen, Amen.

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

LUKE, "the beloved Physician," was undoubtedly the writer of this book; and, intending it as an appendix to his gospel, he inscribes it likewise to Theophilus. (Preface to the gospel of St. Luke.) Indeed the whole may be considered as one publication in two parts: but the convenience of having the four gospels together, seems to have induced Christians in early times to divide it, by inserting St. John's gospel between these two parts. As the history terminates with St. Paul's imprisonment at Rome, during two years, which certainly ended before A. D. 65; it may fairly be concluded, that it was written within thirty or thirty-one years after our Lord's crucifixion: for it can hardly be supposed, that the sacred writer would have closed his narrative so abruptly, and not have carried it on something further, had he composed it at a later period. The early reception also of this book, as authentic and divine, among the primitive Christians, has been sufficiently proved by learned men from the testimony of ancient writers. But the circumstance which most of all demands our attention, and should raise our expectations respecting it, is this: it records the fulfilment of the ancient prophecies concerning the kingdom of the promised Messiah, and the manner in which it should be established in the world: and also of those predictions, or promises, which our Lord gave to his disciples, "while he was yet with them," concerning the powers with which they should be endued, the success which would attend their labours, and the persecutions which awaited them; (Notes, Matt. 10:16—23. 24:6—8 Luke 10:17—20, v. 18. 21:12—19. John 12:27—33, vv. 31,32. 14:7—14, v. 12,25,26. 15:17—21. 16:1—3,7—13.)—It is a fact, which cannot be doubted, that the religion of Jesus the Nazarene, who expired on a cross at Jerusalem, almost eighteen hundred years ago, was soon very extensively propagated among the nations; that it obtained a permanent establishment, which it preserves to this day; and that the prophets had foretold that this would be the case, as to the kingdom of the Messiah: but the book before us is the only history which expressly relates the manner in which this religion was at first promulgated.—Here we are informed, that eleven obscure men, whom Jesus had called to be his attendants and apostles, having continued with him till his crucifixion, saw and conversed with him after his resurrection, and afterwards beheld him ascend from them towards heaven, "till a cloud received him out of their sight." In a few days, having appointed one in the room of the twelfth who had betrayed his Lord and destroyed himself, and being accompanied with a small number of disciples, the Holy Spirit, according to the promise of their Lord, descended upon them, in a most extraordinary manner, enabling them to speak divers languages, and work stupendous miracles; and in all respects qualifying them for their arduous undertaking.—Accordingly, without further delay, within less than two months from the time when Jesus was crucified; and at Jerusalem, under the immediate notice of his crucifiers, they began boldly to declare that he was risen from the dead, ascended into heaven, and exalted at the right hand of God; that he was the promised Messiah, "the Prince of Life," the Saviour and Judge of the world, and as such entitled to all confidence, obedience, and adoration; and openly to charge the people, the priests, and the rulers, with murdering "the Lord of glory." They were themselves unarmed, and unprotected except by a divine power: they possessed neither human learning, eloquence, nor influence: yet they had all the wisdom and the folly, the learning and the ignorance, the religion and the irreligion, with all the obstinate and varied prejudices, and corrupt passions and habits of the whole world to encounter: as well as the power of rulers and princes to oppose them: notwithstanding which, they became decidedly and permanently triumphant. They employed no weapons but simple testimony to the facts which they had witnessed, cogent arguments, affectionate persuasions, holy beneficent lives, fervent prayers, and patient sufferings even unto death.—With the Jews they reasoned from the Scriptures of the Old Testament, and showed how exactly these had been fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth, and when they afterwards went among the Gentiles, they reasoned with them from such principles as they themselves acknowledged.—Proceeding in this manner, and every where attended by a divine power, both manifested in undeniable miracles, and by inwardly preparing men's hearts to receive the truth; they had such astonishing success, that many hundreds of thousands, if not millions, not only from among the Jews and proselytes, but also from the grossest and most licentious idolaters, became the avowed disciples of the crucified Jesus, and the devoted worshippers and servants of "the one living and true God." Thus, in 'the Acts of the Apostles,' there is given us a history of the manner in which the most extraordinary revolution that ever took place in the moral and religious state of the world was first begun; the effects of which were afterwards extended far more widely, till Christianity became the religion of powerful and numerous nations, and superseded the idolatries and superstitions in which they were before enveloped: and if this account be true, the gospel must be divine.

Now one most extraordinary circumstance attends this narrative; namely, if the truth of it be not admitted, there is no other history extant in the world which can be substituted in its place: and thus an event, productive of far more extensive and important consequences than any other which ever yet occurred on earth, took place in a manner, of which no account has been transmitted to posterity!—This book is indeed the report of friends to the cause: but there is no counter report with which we may compare it. Neither Jewish scribes and priests, nor Gentile philosophers, historians, or moralists, ever attempted, that we find, to write a history of the first introduction of Christianity, in order to confront the account given by the Christians. The things here recorded "were not done in a corner." Jerusalem, Cesarea, Antioch, and Ephesus, all great and celebrated cities, nay, Rome itself, the proud capital of the world, were among the places in which the miracles are attested to have been wrought, and the success attained, in the full view of vehement and powerful opposers, who never ventured to deny the facts, though they could not account for them, without allowing the truth of the gospel.—Indeed, the silence of the scribes and priests, who were loudly called upon to vindicate themselves from the charge of the most atrocious crimes; and even that of the heathen writers, in such a cause, is a plain confession that they had nothing to say.

Some modern skeptics, however, insinuate in a covert manner, that a very different account might be given of the triumphs of Christianity than that contained in Scripture; but all their observations are grounded in misapprehension or misrepresentation. The time for giving another history of these events is long since past, and there are no materials for composing one. And indeed, to suppose that such a religion as Christianity, which directly opposes every corrupt passion of the human heart, without making the least allowance either to persons in the highest stations, or to its most zealous friends, could have prevailed in the world as it has done, by such instruments and means, and in the face of such powerful opposition, without the power of God succeeding it; is to assume, without shadow of proof, a fact immensely more incredible, than any of the miracles recorded in Scripture, or all of them combined.

We must not, however, here expect a full and particular history of the labours and successes of the apostles and primitive evangelists: a select specimen alone is given. After the pouring out of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost, and the first successes and sufferings of the apostles, little is recorded in the Scripture concerning most of them. Indeed, the names of more than half of them are never mentioned after the first chapter: yet it cannot reasonably be doubted, that they laboured, suffered, and prospered as their brethren did; though most of the ancient records and traditions concerning them are so mingled with fiction, as not to be entitled to implicit or indiscriminate credit. Some other labourers are likewise brought forward, as Stephen the first martyr, Philip the evangelist, Barnabas, Silas, and others. But the conversion of Saul the persecutor, with his subsequent labours, sufferings, and triumphs, as the apostle of the Gentiles, occupies a large proportion of the book; and the mention of the other apostles in that part of the history, is occasional and brief. Peter, indeed, the apostle of the circumcision, was chosen to instruct Cornelius and his friends, (the first-fruits from among the Gentiles,) doubtless to avoid giving needless offence to the Jews, and the martyrdom of James, the brother of John, is briefly related. Indeed, the labours of St. Paul himself are recorded in a very compendious manner. The events of several years are summed up in two or three chapters. And though, after Luke the historian joined the apostle, and became his faithful companion, (which is shown by his using the first person plural in the narrative,) he is somewhat more circumstantial: yet the epistles of St. Paul prove, that his labours, persecutions, and successes, were far greater, and the instructions which he gave his converts, far more particular, than a cursory reading of this history would lead us to suppose. At the same time, the remarkable coincidence, even in minute particulars, of the history and the epistles, is of such a nature, as could never have taken place, had not both been genuine; which will appear more fully when the epistles come under our consideration.

But the book, on which we now enter, contains also a specimen of true believers, as illustrating the nature and effects of genuine Christianity: and it should be carefully noted, that in every age, all those multitudes who are called Christians, yet bear no resemblance to this specimen, will be driven away as chaff, at the great decisive day: and that the more we are like these primitive believers, when "great grace was upon them all," the more evident it is, that we shall 'be numbered with them in glory everlasting.'—Some intimations are also given of the manner in which the primitive church was constituted and governed, its ministers were appointed, and its ordinances administered: yet it can hardly be supposed, but that the eager disputants of all those parties into which the church is at present unhappily divided, must feel considerably disappointed in this respect; and secretly regret, that more particular and explicit information has not been given on these subjects: but this the Lord for wise reasons has seen good to withhold.

CHAPTER I.

The sacred writer addresses his narrative to Theophilus, 1. Christ, being risen, instructs his disciples; commands them to wait at Jerusalem, for the promise of the Holy Spirit; and ascends towards heaven in their sight, 2—9. Two angels assure them, that he would come again in like manner, 10, 11. The apostles and disciples at Jerusalem continue in prayer, with one accord, 12—14. Peter calls on them to appoint another apostle instead of Judas, in whose awful doom he Scripture had been fulfilled, 15—22. Matthias is chosen by lot, accompanied with prayer, 23—26.

NOTES.—CHAP. I. V. 1—3. Luke began this history by referring his pious friend Theophilus to that gospel which formed the introduction to it. (Note, Luke 1:1—4.) He had there given a specimen of the miracles, actions, and doctrine of Christ, and the general scope of all that he did and taught, from his entrance on his public ministry at his baptism by John, till his ascension into heaven, after that he had given proper instructions and injunctions to his chosen apostles. (Marg. Ref. c, d. Notes, Luke 24:50—53.)—The phrase, "began both, &c." simply means, what Jesus had done and taught, from the beginning to the close of his public ministry. —The use of the word "all" in this connexion, when so many miracles and discourses of our Lord are recorded by the other evangelists, is a full demonstration, that arguments tending to establish universal conclusions, from this general term, must be precarious. (Note, John 1:6—9.)—The expression "by the Holy Ghost," may either refer to our Lord's choosing the apostles, or to his giving them commandments after his resurrection: but the latter seems to be intended; as he "breathed upon them, and bade them receive the Holy Ghost;" and as he then "opened their understandings, that they might understand the Scriptures." (Marg.

All those things which Jesus did and taught, in respect of his human nature, are ascribed to the Holy Spirit; as well as the endowments which he conferred upon his disciples.—It is also stated, that Jesus "showed himself alive" to his apostles, after his death, by many signs, or evidences, which could not possibly deceive them: (Note, John 20:24—29.) as he was seen of them, at different times, for the space of forty days, and conversed freely with them concerning those things which related to the establishment, privileges, and laws of that "kingdom of God," which was about to be set up on earth, by the preaching of his gospel. (Marg. Ref. h, k. Note, Matt. 3:2.)—'By speaking to, by walking, and by eating with them, he gave them certain indication that he lived; that he was seen and handled by them, was a sure evidence that he had a true and natural body; that he permitted Thomas to view the scars of his hands and feet, and put his hand into his side, was a certain token that the body raised was the same which was crucified, and pierced by the soldier's lance. . . . "Concerning the kingdom of God." Namely, Of teaching the doctrine of this kingdom to all nations, and receiving them into it by baptism, who believed, and professed to own it; of the benefits which were promised to them who cordially believed their doctrine, and the condemnation which belonged to them who would not believe it; of the encouragements and assistances he would afford them in the propagation of it, by his continual presence with them, and the assistance of his Spirit; and by the miracles by which their doctrine should be confirmed.' Whitby. It is, however, highly probable, that a great deal more passed on these most interesting subjects, between our Lord and his apostles in the course of the forty days preceding his ascension, than is any where recorded.

V. 4—8. The apostles and disciples, no doubt, returned from Galilee to Jerusalem, and assembled there by their Lord's appointment. (Notes, Matt. 28:18. Luke 24:50—53.)—He was about to be taken from them, and they might seem to be without employment in that city: yet they were charged "not to depart thence;" but to wait there for the pouring out of the Holy Spirit, which he had promised to send them from the Father. (Marg. Ref. l, m. Notes, John 14:15—17,25,26. 15:26,27. 16:7—13.) For it was proper that this extraordinary event should occur in the very place where Jesus had before been publicly crucified. This would fully answer to what John had testified concerning him; as it would be a most remarkable baptism by the Holy Spirit, both communicating to them miraculous powers, and more abundantly illuminating and sanctifying their souls. This took place on the tenth day after our Lord's ascension. (Marg. Ref. n, o. Notes, 2:1—4. Matt. 3:11,12.)—But, notwithstanding all which he had taught them, they still entertained some thoughts of a temporal kingdom: (Marg. Ref. p, q. Notes, Matt. 18:1—4. 24:3.) perhaps they supposed that the pouring out of the Holy Spirit would induce the nation, in general, to acknowledge Jesus as the Messiah; and that he would then perform, what they supposed to be the meaning of the ancient prophets in this respect. (Note, 3:19—21, v. 21.) Yet they seem to have feared, lest the base usage, which he had received from the rulers and people of Israel, should deter him from "restoring the kingdom" to the nation, as in the days of David and Solomon. Our Lord, however, knew that his ascension, and the descent of the Holy Spirit would finally terminate these expectations: he therefore checked their curiosity, by observing, that it was not proper for them to know these matters; which were entirely at the disposal of God, to be managed and effected by his sovereign power and authority, "and according to the counsel of his own will," with which no one must presume to interfere. (Marg. Ref. r, s. Notes, Deut. 29:29. Matt. 24:36—41, v. 36. John 21:18—23, v. 22. 1 Thes. 5:1—3.) But he assured them that they would be endued with the Holy Spirit, enabling them to perform many wonderful works; as well as emboldening and strengthening them for their work, and giving them abundant success in it. Thus they would become witnesses of his resurrection, ascension, miracles, and doctrine, in all parts of the earth. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. t—y. Notes, Luke 24:44—49. John 15:26,27.)—The apostles seem to have understood, that they were authorized to preach to the Samaritans, who were circumcised, and observed many parts of the ceremonial law, though in many respects both heretical and schismatical: but they were not aware, till long after, that uncircumcised Gentiles were to be admitted into the kingdom of their Lord, without any regard to the rites of the Mosaic law. (Notes, 3:19—21, v. 21. 8:5—8,14—17. 10:9—23,36—48. 11:1—18.) It is, however, not only difficult, but perhaps impossible, to delineate, with any tolerable precision, the state of the apostle's minds at this crisis; in which darkness and light, hopes and fears, carnal and spiritual views and expectations, were blended so intimately, that almighty power alone could separate them. And this was done at once, and effectually, in most things, by the descent of the Holy Spirit, though in a few particulars, they were left for some time longer, under a degree of error or prejudice.—The change wrought in the minds and hearts of the apostles, on the day of Pentecost, was as truly miraculous as the gift of tongues. They were no longer the same men; nay, in many respects, men of a widely different spirit and character, possessing an enlargement of mind, and a superiority to carnal prejudices, hopes, and fears, beyond what could have possibly been previously conceived.

V. 9—12. The instructions and promises which have been considered, seem to have been delivered, as our Lord was leading the disciples forth to that part of the mount of Olives whence he ascended: after which he was gradually raised from the earth, in their sight, till a cloud intercepted their view of him. (Marg. Ref. z, a. Notes, 2 Kings 2:11. Luke 24:50—53.) And while they looked earnestly after him, with mixed astonishment, regret, and exultation; two angels, in the form of men, accosted them, demanding why they gazed after their ascended Lord, as if they either desired his present return, or counted him lost to them. For, though he was now ascended to his glorious throne in heaven, to return no more, to reside on earth in his former condition: yet he would assuredly come at length, in a visible manner, in the clouds of heaven, to judge the world, and to gather to himself all his believing people, as he had often promised them. (Marg. Ref. b—f. Notes, Matt. 25:31—46. 26:63—68. John 14:1—3. 1 Thes. 4:13—18. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. 2:1,2. Heb. 9:24—28. Rev. 1:7.) Upon this they returned to Jerusalem from mount Olivet.—The place belonging to the village of Bethany, from which Jesus ascended, was about a mile distant from Jerusalem: this was called a sabbath-day's journey probably, because it might generally be necessary to go so the mount called Olivet, which is from Jerusalem [b]a sabbath-day's journey. [Practical Observations.]

V. 13, 14. Many have supposed that this "upper room" was one of the chambers belonging to the temple. But 'these chambers were all appointed for sacred things or persons: how improbable therefore is it, that poor fishermen, and Galileans, odious for their Master's sake, should be permitted to crowd, in such numbers, into one of these rooms!' Whitby. —The circumstance of the disciples being "continually in the temple," (Luke 24:53.) only shows that they resorted from their lodgings or place of assembling, to the temple at proper hours. (Notes, 2:44—47. 3:1—11, v. 1.) Others have conjectured, that the company met in the house of Mary, mother to John Mark: (12:12.) but even this, though far more probable, is altogether uncertain.—'The assemblies of the church, to hear the word, and to join in common prayers, were first instituted and celebrated by apostolical authority, in a private house.'—The brethren, or kinsmen, of our Lord, seem to have been the same who formerly did not believe in him. (Notes, Mark 3:20,21,31—35. John 7:3—10.)—This is the last time in which Mary the mother of Jesus is mentioned in Scripture: and it is in a very cursory manner as one of the company who joined in prayer; but without any peculiar distinction, or the least appearance of her exercising authority over the apostles, or even of giving them counsel, or at all interfering in their measures. Peter, &c. V. 15. The whole number of disciples, collected together at this time, was about one hundred and twenty. Names.] Ονοματα. Rev. 3:4. 11:13.—Note, Rev. 11:13,14. —Persons, without special distinction, are evidently meant by Luke.

V. 16—18. While the disciples were continually uniting together in persevering prayer and supplication, it occurred to Peter, to propose the appointment of another apostle, in the place of the traitor Judas, that the number of twelve might be restored. Peter's guilt in denying his Lord had been so great, as at first sight to appear almost like that of Judas: it is therefore most reasonable to suppose, that he was directed by a divine admonition, to take the lead on this occasion; and the whole transaction showed how fully all concerned were satisfied, that he was sincerely and deeply penitent.—In his address he called the disciples "Men and brethren." Our Lord never thus addressed the people; and perhaps it implied an equality, not suitable to the dignity of his character: but the apostles frequently did in speaking to Jews, as well as Christians; yet never in addressing the Gentiles: and it seems to imply, that they recognized a two-fold relation to them as men of the same nature descended from Adam, and as brethren of the same favoured family as descended from Abraham. (Marg. Ref. b.)—Peter reminded the disciples, that the words, not of David, but of the Holy Spirit speaking by David, concerning Judas, when he prophesied of Christ, or spake as a type of him, had been exactly fulfilled. (Marg. Ref. c—e. Notes, Ps. 41:9. 69:22—28. 109: 6—20.) Judas had indeed been numbered with them as an apostle: yet he had deserved his doom by his treachery and base behaviour, in conducting those who came to apprehend his Lord; but all which he gained, as "the wages of his iniquity," having been restored by him to the chief priests, had merely served to purchase a field, which in some sense he might be said to have purchased, as he supplied the money which paid for it: and then in despair hanging himself, (perhaps in this very field,) by some accident he fell down, and burst asunder; so that he became a horrid spectacle to the beholders, by the righteous judgment of God upon him (*Marg. V. 19. This verse seems to come in as a parenthesis, and to be the words, not of the apostle, but of the historian; who informed his readers that this event became generally known to all the inhabitants of Jerusalem; and that the field, which had been bought with the price of the blood of Jesus, and which cost Judas his life also, was commonly called "the field of blood," at the time when the history was written.—It is remarkable, that he does not say, in our, but their proper tongue, and this, I think, shows that the writer was not a Hebrew, but either a Hellenist, or a Gentile. (Preface to Luke. Note, Matt. 27:6—10, v. 8.) Some think, that Judas also was buried in this field; if so he bought a burying-place among strangers for himself, with "the wages of his iniquity." (Notes, Num. 31:8. 2 Pet. 2:15,16.)

V. 20—22. The apostle proceeded to observe, that as the Scriptures had been fulfilled in the doom of Judas, so the same Scriptures pointed out to them what their present conduct ought to be: for as it was predicted that "his habitation should be desolate;" so it was directed, that another should take his office and charge. It behooved them, therefore, to take one of their company, who had attended on Jesus with them, from the very beginning of his ministry to his ascension into heaven; that he might be solemnly set apart, to be, with them, a witness of his resurrection, as well as to perform other parts of the apostolical office.—Let his, &c. ber of the seventy disciples, and were eminent for wisdom and integrity. But being unable to decide whether of them was the most proper for the charge, they referred the matter by prayer, and by casting lots, to the Lord's determination. As Jesus had personally appointed the other apostles, many expositors have argued, that this prayer was immediately addressed to him; and the language favours the supposition. (Marg. Ref. y, z.) They, however, appealed to the Searcher of all hearts, to determine whether of the two he had chosen to take part of the authority, trust, and labour of the apostleship; from which Judas had fallen by his atrocious crime, to go to that dreadful place of punishment, to which he was righteously condemned. In answer to this appeal, the Lord was pleased that the lot should fall upon Matthias; whom some suppose to have been the same as Nathanael, because both their names signify "the gift of God:" but this is very uncertain. It is remarkable, that Matthias is never mentioned in Scripture, except on this occasion, but Barsabas is. (Notes, 15:22—35, vv. 22,32.) Yet, no doubt, the Lord had wise and holy reasons for choosing Matthias, though they are wholly unknown to us. (Marg. Ref. a—e. Note, Prov. 16:33.)—The prayer offered on this occasion, was wholly unlike what might have been expected from deceivers. It is dictated by a deep sense of the Lord's perfect acquaintance with all hearts, the importance of the cause in which they were engaged, and their incompetency to decide in it without divine direction. The whole account when compared with the surprising blindness of the disciples, to the true meaning of the prophecies, before the resurrection of Christ, illustrates the evangelist's words, "Then opened he their understandings, to understand the Scripture:" (Note, Luke 24:44—49, v. 44.) for there is a constant recurrence to the sacred oracles, and a clear and sound interpretation of the passages adduced.—It is wonderful, that any persons should have referred to this narrative, in the argument concerning the choice of ministers: when the case was most evidently extraordinary, and one which could never again occur; and when the eleven apostles, with a number of the seventy disciples, probably formed the far greater part of the company present.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. While we thankfully peruse the instructive narrative "of all that Jesus began both to do, and to teach;" let us remember, that all instruction should be reduced to practice; and that ministers should begin to do, and then to teach, that their example may illustrate, confirm, and adorn their doctrine. For these ends, we need a daily supply of that Spirit, by which Jesus "gave commandment to his apostles;" that we may be effectually convinced of those truths, which, though authenticated by "infallible proofs," are never cordially and practically believed, till his teaching removes the veil of pride and worldly lusts, from the understanding and the heart. (Notes, 2 Cor. 3:12—18. 4:3—6.) Then, and not before, we learn to profit by what Jesus has spoken "concerning the kingdom of God;" and are induced to seek its privileges, and to obey its commandments. We should therefore wait for this "promise of the Father," according to the directions which our Lord has given us. We do not indeed expect the miraculous powers of the Holy Spirit: but we must experience his purifying baptism, or we never can serve God, or be made meet for the inheritance of heaven. In proportion as this is deficient, (for it is communicated in different degrees,) even true believers remain under the influence of carnal prejudices, and cleave to earthly things; by which they are kept in error, or betrayed into curious questions and frivolous speculations. But it behooves us to leave "secret things to the Lord, to whom they belong;" and

CHAPTER II.

The day of Pentecost being come, the Holy Spirit is poured out on the assembled disciples, with "a sound as of a mighty wind;" while "cloven tongues as of fire" rest on each of them, 1—3. They speak divers languages, in the hearing of multitudes from many nations, who are come together on the occasion; at which most are amazed, but some deride, 4—13. Peter shows, that this is the fulfilment of a prophecy of Joel, 14—21; that Jesus, whom they had crucified, was risen from the dead, according to the prophecy of David, 22—32; and that being ascended into heaven, and exalted at the right hand of God, he had poured out the Holy Spirit, to demonstrate that he was the promised Messiah, 33—36. They are pricked to the heart, and inquire what they must do, 37. Peter exhorts and encourages them to repent, and to be baptized in the name of Jesus, 38—40. Three thousand are added to the church, 41. They continue steadfast in the faith, 42. Many miracles are wrought by the apostles, 43. The disciples have all things in common, and abound in love, joy, and praise; while numbers are daily added to them, 44—47.

AND when [a]the day of Pentecost was fully come, [b]they were all with one accord in one place.

to submit to his wisdom, in all the dispensations of his providence and grace. (P. O. Job 28:12—28. John 21:18—23.) It is enough, that he has engaged to give his people strength adequate to their trials and services: that, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, they may, in one way or other, be witnesses for Christ on earth; while in heaven he manages their concerns with the most perfect wisdom, truth, and love. In our affections and hopes, we ought to follow our ascended Saviour, that our conversation and our hearts may be in heaven; and that our expectation of his second coming may be steadfast and joyful, by our "giving diligence to be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless." (Notes, Col. 3:1—4. 2 Pet. 3:10—13.)

V. 13—26. In order to serve the cause of Christ on earth, we should study to be "of one heart" with all his true disciples; that, by mutual conference, we may encourage and animate each other, and that our united prayers may be more fervent, persevering and uninterrupted. (Note, 1 Pet. 3:7.) Thus we may have peace, in communion with God and his saints, notwithstanding the enmity and rage of an ungodly world.—As the church of Christ at first consisted of only few persons, so we ought not to "despise the day of small things." (Note, Zech. 4:8—10.) A little company, united in love, exemplary in their conduct, fervent in prayer, and prudently zealous in promoting the cause of Christ, by every means in their power, will generally increase with rapidity.—We should carefully observe the dispensations of providence, and compare them with the holy Scriptures; not only for the confirmation of our faith, but in order to learn our duty: and we ought to point out to our brethren those intimations, which are thus suggested to us; that we may unite our endeavours to do good, as circumstances may require, and occasions may offer.—The crimes and awful end of some ministers, who have been high in rank and reputation in the church, should by no means lead men to despise that sacred calling: but such instances loudly require others, "to look to themselves," to their motives and intentions, as well as to their doctrine and moral conduct. The nearer men approach to Jesus in profession and office, the more detestable is their treachery, if they secretly concur with his enemies, and betray his cause to them. The gain of hypocrites is "the reward of iniquity," and it will only purchase for them an "Aceldama, a field of blood," a more awful condemnation and more notorious infamy: for, if they die impenitent, as it is highly probable they will, in what way soever they leave the world, and whether their habitations be left desolate or flourishing, they must follow Judas to their "own place," even that prepared for "the workers of iniquity," and to each of them according to the degree of guilt contracted by him.—But when mercenary and ungodly men are removed; we should beseech the great Searcher of hearts, to fill their places in the church with such ministers as have known Christ, and are capable of being witnesses for him, and of declaring to others the efficacy of his sufferings, and "the power of his resurrection." Those who are intrusted in this matter should be careful to "lay hands suddenly on no man:" but, while they do their best, to select the most able and upright persons for this sacred service, they ought to pour out their most earnest prayers to him, "who knoweth what is in man," to direct their choice, and to determine for them, who are, and who are not, proper persons. (Notes, 1 Tim. 5:21,22, 24,25.) Where this is omitted, or when it degenerates into a form: we need not wonder to see the church crowded with drones, hirelings, blind guides, persecutors, and heretics; instead of faithful, able, disinterested, and laborious ministers of Christ. Indeed in every thing, when we have gone as far as we can, "according to the wisdom given" to us, we should, in one way or other, refer the decision to the Lord: and surely the lot, which, under both the Old and the New Testament dispensation, has been used and owned, as a solemn and religious appeal to God's providence, to decide doubtful matters for his worshippers, ought not to be used by Christians in such frivolous concerns, or in so irreverent a man-

NOTES.—CHAP. II. V. 1. The word "Pentecost" implies, that this was the fiftieth day; that is, from the second day of unleavened bread, whence "the feast of the in-gathering" of the harvest was computed. The Israelites were commanded to bring a meat-offering of the first-fruits of their corn, at this festival: which was observed, as it is generally supposed, in commemoration of the giving of the law from mount Sinai, fifty days after their departure out of Egypt. (Marg. Ref. a. Notes, Ex. 19:1. 23:14—18. Lev. 23:15—21. Deut. 16:9.) At this solemnity, the Lord was pleased to "pour out his Spirit," and thus to consecrate the first-fruits of the Christian church. Multitudes, from all parts of the country, and from distant regions, were constantly collected at Jerusalem on this occasion: and more than usual seem to have attended this year; perhaps from the general expectation which prevailed, that the Messiah would soon appear. Thus numbers, who at the preceding passover had seen Jesus crucified with ignominy, and had carried the report of it to their several places of abode, would now see this remarkable proof of his resurrection and ascension; and this would every where be made known in like manner.—As Jesus arose on the first day of the week, so the Holy Spirit descended on the same, seven weeks, or on the fiftieth day, afterwards. This tended to honour that day, which was soon to be set apart as the Christian Sabbath. (Notes, 20:7—12, v. 7. John 20:19—29, vv. 19,26. 1 Cor. 16:1,2. Rev. 1:9—11, v. 10.)—The day of Pentecost, properly speaking, began the preceding evening; so that in the morning it might be said to be "fully come:" and the apostles, and their company, were then collected together in entire harmony and love; probably in the upper room, where they before assembled for prayer and religious conference. (Marg. Ref. b. Note, 1:13,14.) No objection to this can properly be made, on account of the room being too small to hold the multitudes which afterwards came together: for we must suppose, that they surrounded the house where the apostles had been, and that these went out to them: as no building, which they could procure, could possibly hold such immense numbers.—Different opinions are maintained, concerning the persons assembled on this occasion: whether the apostles only, or the whole company of disciples: but the language of the sacred writer obviously implies the latter; the pouring out of the Spirit on all the disciples would form a more exact fulfilment of Joel's prophecy; (18) and it is plain that others, besides the apostles, were "filled with the Holy Ghost," at a very early period. (6:3,5,8.) As afterwards, miraculous powers, and the gift of languages, were conferred on others, by the laying on of the hands of the apostles; so without this, the gift of tongues was now conferred on converts in general. (Notes, 8:14—17. 10:44—48.) There seems therefore no sufficient reason for supposing, that this first effusion of the Spirit was exclusively bestowed on the apostles. Indeed, either the apostles assembled together alone, as if for this special purpose, of which no intimation is given; or else the whole company partook of the blessing: and this certainly accords to the tradition of the church in ancient times.

V. 2, 3. While the assembled disciples were thus waiting the performance of the promise, which their Lord had given them; (1:4,8.) there came a sound from heaven, resembling that of an impetuous wind, which rushed in and filled the house, where they were sitting. This was an emblem of the invincible energy with which the Holy Spirit works upon the minds of men; bearing down all opposition before him; in a manner which cannot be explained, but which is most manifest by its effects. (Marg. Ref. c, d. Notes, John 3:7, 8. 1 Thes. 1:5—8.) At the same time there appeared the form of "tongues," divided at the tip of them, and resembling fire; one of which rested on each of the whole company. This was an emblem of the gift at this time bestowed upon them, of speaking, with fluency and propriety, divers languages which they had never learned; and the appearance "as of fire," denoted the fervent zeal with which they were enabled to speak, and the effects which their words produced upon the minds of the hearers. (Marg. Ref. f—h. Notes, Is. 6:6,7. Jer. 23:28,29. Matt. 3:11,12.)—The shape of the mitre, worn by bishops, is by some thought to have been derived from the supposed form of these divided tongues; but if they sat on every one present, (as the original determines,) and others besides the apostles were present, the ground of this distinction fails. Indeed it is more likely, that there appeared several divisions in the tongues, than merely two; as the former would be a more exact emblem of the gift of speaking divers languages, conferred at the same time.

V. 4. At the time of these extraordinary appearances, the whole company were abundantly replenished with the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit: (Marg. Ref. i.) so that they "began to speak with other tongues," or in languages of which they had before been entirely ignorant: as also with more distinct views and lively affections; even as the Spirit suggested divine truths to their minds, and enabled them to discourse upon them in a suitable manner. (Marg. Ref. k, l.) A more stupendous miracle than this can scarcely be imagined; as every one must perceive, who carefully considers the subject; and recollects with what difficulty an adult person acquires the accurate knowledge and pronunciation even of one language, so as to speak it with propriety, and without hesitation. At the same time, it was of the utmost importance to the end designed: for, while it served to confirm the testimony of the witnesses of our Lord's resurrection, it qualified the apostles and first preachers of the gospel for their important service, to which their want of learning would have otherwise been an insurmountable hinderance.—The diversity of languages introduced by the power of God, as a judgment on the presumptuous and rebellious builders at Babel, has always been the great obstacle to the diffusion of useful knowledge and of true religion. (Notes, Gen. 11:1—9. Is. 25:6—8.) The persons therefore whom the Lord saw good to employ in propagating the Christian religion among the nations, and who were unacquainted with foreign languages, could have made no progress in their work, without this special gift, or something equivalent to it: for even the Jews dispersed in foreign countries generally spoke the Greek tongue. But, the deficiency being supplied in this miraculous manner, enabled them to show the credentials of their commission from God, along with their ability for the service to which they were called, in every place whither they went.—'As the confusion of tongues in Babel spread idolatry throughout the world, and made men lose the knowledge of God and true religion; so God provided, by the gift of tongues in Zion, to repair the knowledge of himself among the nations.' Whithy.

V. 5. Numbers of Jews and proselytes, at that time, were collected in Jerusalem, who had come up to celebrate the feast: (Note, 1.) and many took up their residence there more permanently, in order to attend on the worship at the temple, to which they had a devoted affection; and for education and religious instruction. (Note, 6:9—14, v. 9.)—The phrase, "every nation under heaven," is no doubt hyperbolical, and refers to all those nations among which the people of Israel had been scattered. (Marg. Ref. m, o. Note, Deut. 28:64.) It is a general, not a universal proposition: and the interpretation of it, which the subject absolutely requires, should render us cautious of deducing conclusions, and attempting to prove doctrines, from single expressions, at least not more energetic; especially when clear testimonies of Scripture must be explained, differently than their obvious meaning implies, to establish such conclusions. V. 6—11. When "this voice was made," (marg.) or when these extraordinary events were reported abroad; the multitudes came together to the place; and after they had examined the matter, they were thrown into the utmost astonishment, by hearing the apostles and disciples, one after another, address them severally in their own languages For they understood, either by previous information, or by some circumstances respecting them, that they were all natives of Galilee, persons of mean education and employment, who could not be expected to know any other language than the dialect of the Hebrew, or the Syriac, which was there generally used: yet they addressed themselves to every one of the company, in that language which was peculiar to his native country; the same persons also speaking to several of them in succession, in different languages, without the least hesitation or inaccuracy. (Marg. Ref. p—r.)—From the different regions afterwards mentioned, it is computed, that seven or eight distinct languages, and many more different dialects of the same language, must have been thus spoken, that each of this company might hear his native tongue. (Marg. Ref. a—k.) 'The nations here reckoned up, living some in Asia, some in Africa, and some in Europe, are said, though not without an hyperbole, to be "men of every nation under heaven." (5)' Whitby.—But the multitude not only remarked the languages, in which the apostles discoursed; but also, that they spake of "the wonderful works," or "the great things of God," even those great things, which related to his salvation, and his mercy and truth to his chosen people, as manifested in the events which had recently taken place. (Marg. Ref. l.)—"The strangers of Rome," mean native Jews, and persons proselyted to their religion, who generally resided at Rome, but then sojourned as strangers at Jerusalem.—The gospel was preached, and Christianity established, very early, in many of the countries here mentioned; and no doubt, the events of this important day had a powerful influence in facilitating its introduction and progress among them.—In Judea, &c. (9) Matt. 26:73.—The peculiar dialect of the Galileans no longer was perceived by the inhabitants of Judea.

V. 12, 13. The strangers, who perfectly understood the words of the disciples, were fully satisfied of the reality of the miracle; though they were in doubt, and great perplexity, as to the meaning and intention of it; but others derided them as a company of drunkards, who, having drunk too freely of the "new" wine prepared for the feast, uttered unmeaning sounds in a confused and clamorous manner, as if they were speaking in other languages. (Marg. Ref.) It is probable, that these were the inhabitants of Judea, who understood no language except their own; and were more prejudiced against Jesus, than those who came from a distance were: yet some of these observed, that the Galileans were no longer distinguishable by their peculiar pronunciation. V. 14—21. As Peter is said to have stood up "with the eleven," we may suppose, that they also spake, to the same effect, to other companies of the assembled multitude; according to the different languages which their several hearers best understood: though the substance of his discourse only is recorded for our instruction. He lifted up his voice, and spake with such boldness, and in so audible a manner, that he silenced the mixed conversation, and fixed the attention of the people. He addressed himself especially to the men of Judea, and those who more statedly sojourned at Jerusalem; and no doubt he spake in the Hebrew or Syriac tongue: and he demanded their serious regard to the highly interesting subject, about which he was about to discourse. He observed, that the opinion, of the company being drunken, was totally groundless, as many present must know: and, as it was no more than "the third hour of the day," or nine o'clock in the morning according to our reckoning, it was very uncandid, to suppose that so many persons had been guilty of excess, on a solemn religious festival, when about to attend on the worship at the temple. (Marg. Ref. o—t.) On the contrary, the effects which they witnessed were a fulfilment of a remarkable prophecy of Joel, concerning the pouring out of the Holy Spirit in the last days of the nation, or in those of the Messiah. (Marg. Ref. y—b.) This prediction has already been explained. (Notes, Joel 2:28—32.) It may here be observed, that the descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost was no more than the beginning of the accomplishment of this prophecy: nor could Peter himself then understand the full meaning of it: for it related to "all flesh," to men of all nations, Gentiles as well as Jews, as it was afterwards verified in the different Christian churches.—The word, "prophesy," may denote, not only the fluency of the persons in speaking of divine things, for the instruction of others, as the term is sometimes used; but also their predicting future events, especially those concerning the approaching ruin of the unbelieving Jewish nation: for "the wonders," afterwards mentioned, evidently relate to the prodigies which preceded and attended the destruction of Jerusalem, and the subsequent devastations; as these were, in some respects, typical of the terrors and solemnities connected with the end of the world and the day of judgment (Notes, Matt. 24:29—51.) Whether or not we here understand, by "calling on the name of the LORD," an application to the Lord Jesus Christ for salvation, as in a parallel passage; (Marg. Ref. f. Note, Rom. 10:12—17.) the apostle certainly meant to warn the Jews, that none of their prayers would be heard, for deliverance from the approaching miseries, if they continued to reject their promised Messiah, whose coming, resurrection, and exaltation were attested to them by these miraculous operations of the Holy Spirit: and the connexion of the words implies the same warning to all who read them, in respect of deliverance, "from the wrath to come."

The quotation, though in general made in the words of the Septuagint, varies from that version, and from the Hebrew text, in nearly the same particulars. Instead of "afterward," or "after these things," we here read, "in the last days;" the order of the clauses in the seventeenth verse is changed, 22 Ye [s]men of Israel, hear these words; [h]Jesus of Nazareth, [i]a man approved of God among you, by miracles, and wonders, and signs, [k]which God did by him in the midst of you, as ye yourselves also know:

23 Him, [l]being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, [m]ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain;

24 Whom [n]God hath raised up, having [o]loosed the pains of death, [p]because it was not possible that he should be holden of it.

25 For [q]David speaketh concerning him, [r]I foresaw the Lord always before my face; [s]for he is on my right hand that I should not be moved:

26 Therefore did my heart rejoice, and [u]my tongue was glad: moreover also my flesh shall rest in hope:

27 Because thou wilt not [x]leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer [y]thine Holy One [z]to see corruption.

28 Thou hast [a]made known to me the ways of life; thou shalt [b]make me full of joy with thy countenance.

29 Men and brethren, [c]let me [c]freely speak unto you of [d]the patriarch [e]David, that he is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us unto this day.

30 Therefore, [f]being a prophet, [g]and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, [h]he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne;

31 He, seeing this before, [i]spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell, neither his flesh did see corruption.

32 This Jesus hath God raised up, [k]whereof we all are witnesses.

V. 22—24. The apostle, in connexion with this prophecy of Joel, and its astonishing fulfilment before their eyes, called the attention of his audience more immediately to the grand subject of his discourse. They all had heard or known many things concerning Jesus, who had been despised as "a Nazarene:" yet it was evident, that he was a man whom God had greatly owned and approved. This appeared from the various, multiplied, and incontestable miracles, which were wrought by him among them, in the most public manner, as they well knew. (Marg. Ref. g—k.) Yet, instead of receiving him as the Son of God, and the Messiah, their rulers had taken him up and condemned him as a malefactor; and so had crucified him "by the hands of the wicked," that is, the hands of the idolatrous Romans: and, as the multitude of the nation had preferred Barabbas to him, and clamorously demanded his crucifixion; this most atrocious murder was become their own act and deed, as much as if they had performed it with their own hands. (Notes, Matt. 27:19—25.)—Indeed all this had been done, "according to the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God;" who had decreed this great event for the most wise, righteous, and merciful purposes; and had also predicted it many ages before: yet that was in no degree an excuse for their guilt, or an extenuation of it; as they were influenced by the basest motives in what they did, and "by wicked hands had crucified and slain him." (Marg Ref. l, m.)—But, though they had murdered this Jesus, as if he had been "a deceiver," God had abundantly vindicated his character and claim, as the promised Messiah; having raised him up, and liberated him from "the bonds of death," or from those bonds in which the pains and agonies of his cruel execution had terminated; (Note, Is. 53:9—12.) by which indeed it was impossible that he should be long confined; whether the dignity of his Person, the nature of his undertaking, the perfection of his work, the purpose of God, or the predictions of Scripture were considered. (Marg. Ref. n—p. Notes, John 2:18—22. 10:14—18.)—Delivered by, &c. (23) 'Him, being permitted by God to fall into your hands, God having withdrawn that protection, which was necessary to have preserved him from them; (and this by his decree, that he should lay down his life for his sheep, in order to that great design of man's salvation, toward which he did by his foreknowledge discern this the fittest expedient;) ye apprehended and crucified most wickedly.' Hammond. 'In Scripture, that is said to be done by "the determinate counsel of God," which is done according to what he had written and declared in his word; all predictions concerning things future, being declarations and determinations that they shall come to pass. (Matt. 26:24. Luke 22:22.) ... This only doth suppose, that God can foresee and foretell, what man, not hindered by him, but left to his own inclinations, will do. And if that foresight hath any influence on the will, to make the action necessary, then ... all our actions must be necessary.' Whitby. Did this learned writer suppose, that, according to the doctrine of Calvinists, the foresight, or even the decree, of God has any influence on the will or free agency of man? If either he, or others, who have brought the same objections, suppose this, they are very blameably ignorant of the doctrine which they would confute.—'God foresees and foretells, what man left to his inclinations will do;' and God determines to leave him to his inclinations. The permission is enough in such a case: but to determine, by preventing grace, to make the sinner willing to submit, believe, and obey, requires a positive interposition of a divine and new creating power, which none deserves, or, left entirely to himself, desires, and which God bestows or withholds, "according to the counsel of his own will."—Again, such texts constrain both the above cited learned writers to allow, that the event was certainly foreseen, and could not but take place; though the persons concerned were under no coercion, and acted according to the lusts of their own hearts. But did God certainly foresee this, as his own all-wise determination and decree; or as something independent on his decree, which could neither be altered nor prevented? (Notes, 4:23—28, v. 28. Matt. 26:21—24. Luke 22:21—23.)

V. 25—32. (Note, 13:24—37.) David in particular had spoken, expressly and exclusively, of the Messiah, in a passage with which the Jews were well acquainted. (Marg. Ref. q—b. Note, Ps. 16:8—11.) This, the apostle stated, would be rendered manifest unto them, if they would permit him to speak freely of David, who was one of the venerable patriarchs of their nation, being the progenitor of that numerous and honourable family, from whom the Messiah was to descend: for it was evident, that David "died, was buried, and saw corruption," like other men; and his sepulchre had been preserved, by frequent repairs, even to that day, in honour of his memory. It therefore followed beyond all controversy that he spake not of himself, in the passage which had been cited; but, being a prophet, and knowing that the Messiah would descend from him, in respect of his human nature, to reign upon his throne over the people of God for ever; (Note, Rom. 1:1—4. 9:4, 5.) in the prospect of these events, "he spake of the resurrection of the Messiah," who was indeed to be put to death, but whose soul would not be left in the place of separate spirits, nor would his body be suffered to lie in the grave, till it began in the least to corrupt. In accomplishment of this prophecy God had actually raised up Jesus, whom the Jews had crucified; but who was indeed the promised Messiah, of the family of David, and born at Bethlehem. This event had taken place on the third day

33 Therefore being [b]by the right hand of God exalted, [m]and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, [n]he hath shed forth this, which ye now see and hear.

34 For David is not ascended into the heavens: but he saith himself, [o]the LORD said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, 35 Until I make [p]thy foes thy footstool.

36 Therefore let [q]all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made [r]that same Jesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ.

[Practical Observations.]

37 ¶ Now when they heard this, [s]they were pricked in their heart, and said unto Peter and to the rest of the apostles, [t]Men and brethren, [u]what shall we do?

38 Then Peter said unto them, [x]Repent, and [y]be baptized every one of you [z]in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, [a]and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost.

39 For [b]the promise is unto you, and to your children, [c]and to all that are afar off, even [d]as many as the Lord our God shall call.

40 And [e]with many other words [f]did he testify and exhort, saying, [g]Save yourselves from this [h]untoward generation.

V. 33—36. The resurrection of Jesus did not rest solely on the testimony of the apostles, and the other disciples. (Note, John 20:24—29.) For, having ascended into heaven, he had been exalted by the power of God, at his right hand, to the highest possible dignity and authority: and, having received, from God the Father, the Holy Spirit, according to the promises of the Scripture to the Messiah, he had poured out upon his disciples all those miraculous gifts and divine influences, the effects of which were witnessed at that time, and which could not possibly be accounted for in any other manner. (Marg. Ref. l—n. Notes, Is. 44:3—5. 59:20,21. 61:1—3. Eph. 1:15—23. 4:7—10. Heb. 1:3,4. 12:2,3.) For David had not arisen from the dead to ascend into heaven, according to the meaning of the Psalm before cited: but in another place, calling the promised Messiah his Lord, though he was to be his Son; he had predicted his ascension into heaven, and his exaltation to the right hand of God; there to be established in supreme authority, till he had subjected all his enemies, and rendered their opposition to him an occasion to his own glory. (Marg. Ref. o, p. Notes, Ps. 110:1. Matt. 22:41—46. 1 Cor. 15:20—28. Eph. 4:11—13.) As therefore the events which the apostles testified, and to which the Holy Spirit poured out upon them also bore witness, accorded so exactly to their ancient prophecies; the whole house of Israel might be assured, by the most complete demonstration imaginable, that God had constituted Jesus of Nazareth, whom they contemptuously crucified, the Lord and Judge of all worlds; and the anointed Prophet, Priest, and King of his chosen people. So that he was actually possessed of complete authority, both to save and bless those who trusted and obeyed him, and also to crush all who should obstinately refuse to submit to him. (Marg. Ref. q, r. Notes, 4:5—12. Rom. 14:7—9. 1 Cor. 8:4—6. Phil. 2:9—11.)—The scope of Peter's argument was to show that the crucified Jesus was indeed the promised Messiah, and that he was actually risen, ascended, and glorified. When the Jews were convinced of this, and were induced to believe on him in that character; they would readily learn from Scripture, and from further instructions, the spiritual nature of his kingdom and salvation, the intent of his sufferings and death, and the various doctrines of his religion.

V. 37—40. The apostle's arguments were invincibly conclusive, and his application most highly interesting; though in other respects his discourse was peculiarly plain and simple. But if we duly consider the complicated evidence of our Lord's doctrine and miracles, and the obstinate unbelief of the Jews notwithstanding; we shall perceive, that neither Peter's words, nor yet the miracle which the people witnessed, would have produced those effects which followed, had not the Holy Spirit also been communicated, to remove the veil of pride, prejudice, and sinful affections from their minds. "The Comforter being come, he convinced them of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment." (Note, John 16:8—11.) The apostle's words, therefore, attended by the powerful convictions of the Holy Spirit, penetrated their hearts like arrows, or as a sharp sword; and, being filled with terror on account of their enormous guilt, in rejecting and "crucifying the Lord of glory, they cried out to the apostles in deep distress, as to their friends and countrymen, inquiring with great earnestness, "What must we do?" Was there any hope for them of escaping the vengeance of their exalted Messiah, whom they had so deeply injured? If there were, by what means could it be done? (Marg. Ref. s—u. Notes, 9:3—6. 16:29 —34. Matt. 7:24—27.) To this the apostle replied, by exhorting them to repent of that, and all their other sins; (Note Matt. 3:2.) and openly to avow their firm belief, that Jesus was indeed the Messiah, by being baptized in his name (Marg. Ref. r, x—z. Note, Matt. 28:19,20. Mark 16:14— 16.) In thus professing their faith in him, all who truly believed would receive a full remission of their sins for his sake as well as a participation of the sanctifying and comforting graces of the Holy Spirit, and many of them likewise of those miraculous powers, which they saw bestowed upon his disciples. (Note, 22:14—16.) For "the promise," both the general promise respecting the Messiah, and the blessings of his kingdom, as made to Abraham their father, (Notes, Gen. 12:1 —3. 17:7,8.) and the particular promise of the Spirit quoted from Joel; (16—21.) was made, or proposed, "to them and to their children;" and not to those present only, but to all however dispersed, whom God should call by his gospel (Marg. Ref. a—d.) Peter's words, as suggested by the Holy Spirit, implied the calling of the Gentiles also; yet he could not himself at this time understand them in that sense (Notes, 1:4—8. 3:19—21. 10:9—16.)—The promise, as made to Abraham, included also his posterity; and that of the new covenant did the same to those who should be interested in it: and the language here accords with this. (Notes, Jer. 32:39 —41. Rom. 11:11—21. 1 Cor. 7:10—14.) The male descendants of Abraham were circumcised, as included in the promise and as a part of the visible church; and this passage may intimate, that the infant-offspring of Christians, being also included in the promise, and in the covenant of their parents, and being a part of the visible church, should be admitted to baptism, which is the outward sign of the same spiritual blessings, as circumcision was. (Note, Gen. 17:9—12.)—Besides this general address, Peter bore witness to the truth, and in the name of God charged his audience with very many other words: the substance of which was, that they ought to embrace the gospel, without waiting for the concurrence of their rulers and teachers, or the rest of the people; (Note, Luke 12:54—57.) and, by thus entering into the church and kingdom of Christ, should save themselves from the destruction which impended over that perverse and rebellious generation of Israel, for obstinately rejecting the promised Messiah; as well as that they should "flee for refuge" to Jesus, "from the wrath to come." (Marg. Ref. e—h. Notes, Heb 6:13 —20.)

V. 41. The apostle had exhorted "every one" of them to be baptized, and "those who gladly received the word" were baptized. As therefore it is highly improbable, that there should have been none of John's disciples in this large company; we may fairly infer, that Christ's baptism was not precisely the same institution with John's; and that from this time, at least, John's disciples were baptized when they were admitted into the Christian church, according to the form appointed by our Lord after his resurrection. (Notes, 19:5,6. Matt. 28:19,20. John 3:22—24.)—Peter exhorted the Jews to be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, as professing their faith in him, the Messiah; yet there is no reason to doubt, that they were baptized, "in," or "into, the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," according to the appointed form.—As so great a number were baptized on this occasion, and as they were not by the river Jordan, "where was much water," or near to any other river; but in the midst of a populous city, crowded also with strangers, it is at least highly probable, that they were not baptized by immersion: especially seeing the baptism of the Holy Ghost, represented by it, is constantly, and in several places of the chapter, spoken of, as "poured out" upon them. (See on 33.)—The numerous converts made on this occasion, though at first "pricked to the heart," are said to have "gladly received" Peter's word. They were deeply convinced of their guilt and danger; and they rejoiced to hear of a free forgiveness, through that Saviour whom they had concurred in crucifying: so that they cheerfully ventured all the consequences of embracing the gospel, and joining themselves, by baptism, to the despised and persecuted disciples of Jesus. (Marg. Ref. i. Notes, 16:29—34. John 16:8—11,14,15. Rom. 10:5—11.)

V. 42, 43. The conversion of this great multitude was sudden; yet their profession was not transient or wavering: for they steadfastly attended on the instructions of the apostles, and adhered to their doctrine, though doubtless many efforts would be made to draw them aside, by reasoning, ridiculing, menacing, or affecting to pity them, as deluded enthusiasts. They also associated with the apostles and disciples in religious conference and worship, joining with them in "breaking of bread," as well as in prayers. (Marg. Ref. m—p.) This seems to refer to the administration of the Lord's supper, in remembrance of the atoning sufferings and death of Christ; which evidently took place very frequently in the primitive times. (Notes, 1 Cor. 10:14—17. 11:17—28.)—The impression also, which these transactions made upon the spectators and all who heard of them, was very great: for all the people were over-awed, and afraid of attempting any thing against the disciples; as they saw evident and signal miracles wrought by the apostles, in confirmation of the resurrection and power of the crucified Jesus. (Marg. Ref. q, r. Note, 5:12—16.)

They continued steadfastly. (42) Ησαν προσκαρτερουντες. 46. See on 1:14.—Fellowship.] Τη κοινωνια. Rom. 15:26. 1 Cor. 1:9. 10:16. 2 Cor. 6:14. 8:4. 9:13. 13:13. Heb. 13:16. 1 John 1:3,6,7, et al. Κοινωνος. Matt. 23:30. Luke 5:10.

V. 44—47. Many of the converts were strangers, who probably were detained at Jerusalem longer than they had intended, in order to get a further insight into the religion which they had embraced; and others were poor: the more affluent, therefore, of the company were contented to share their abundance, in common with their poorer brethren. (Marg. Ref. s—u. Notes, 4:32—37. Gal. 6:1—5.) This was a remarkable evidence of their indifference about the world; of their joy and confidence in the Lord; in his providential care, as well as in his mercy and grace; of their love and gratitude to him, and of their cordial affection to one another, though just before they had been strangers, and divided from each other. (Notes, 10:9—16. Is. 11:6—9. 65:24,25.) Perhaps the predictions which they had heard concerning the approaching desolations of Jerusalem and Judea might concur in influencing them to sell their estates and possessions, that they might impart to every one of the company as each had need. (Note, 14—21.) This was peculiarly suitable to the state of the church at that time, and the same disposition ought always to prevail: yet it is evident, that the same way of expressing it is not required, nor would it be in general expedient. (P. O. Matt. 26:1—13. 2 Cor. 8:10—15.) Indeed it was done at this time, not by command or constraint, but voluntarily. (Note, 5:1—11, v. 4.)—The minds of the new converts were occupied almost entirely with the important concerns of eternal salvation: and as numbers of them were far from home, and probably had not many secular affairs to attend on; they daily continued in the most harmonious manner, to meet together in the courts of the temple for the worship of God, and in the houses of believers, one after another, as they had opportunity; where they hospitably entertained each other, as well as joined in sacred ordinances. (Note, Prov. 8:34.) Thus their very meals were sanctified; as they used the good gifts of God with cheerful gratitude, and in a simple dependence on him, and desire to please him.—They were also greatly occupied in celebrating the praises of God, and blessing him for all his unspeakable benefits: so that even the Jews, who did not join them, held them in great estimation, and showed great favour to them. (Note, 4:32—35.) What a lovely exhibition of the effects of genuine Christianity, when applied and blessed by the Spirit of God! What excellent and what happy characters does it form! Thus the Lord from day to day, inclined the hearts of more and more to embrace the gospel, and join themselves to the disciples of Jesus: and they did not merely profess to be disciples, but were actually brought into a state of acceptance with God, as penitent believers in Christ. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13. Delays as to the performance of God's promises, till the appointed time is "fully come," are peculiarly advantageous to those, who wait on him in patient faith and fervent persevering prayer. When a company of believers are "of one heart," thus to seek and hope for "the pouring out of his Holy Spirit," a revival of true religion may reasonably, nay confidently, be expected: for the promise stands sure, that "our heavenly Father will give his Holy Spirit to them that ask him." (Notes, Jer. 32:39—41. Luke 11:5—13, v. 13.)—We cannot explain the manner of his operation; but we may perceive, that with invincible power he bears down all the opposition of pride and worldly lusts and prejudices, as "with a rushing mighty wind;" and changes the heart like a vehement fire. Sound judgment, heavenly wisdom and knowledge, fervent affections, holy boldness, and a ready utterance in the things of God, are his gifts to those whom he qualifies for the sacred ministry, or to serve the church of Christ in any important public situation; for which all ought simply to depend on him, according to their need. We do not expect such miraculous powers, as were communicated to the apostles on the day of Pentecost; yet we share the benefit of them; both in the demonstrative evidence thus given to the truth of the gospel, and in the infallible declaration, which they have authenticated and transmitted to us, concerning the way in which we may be saved. The remarkable pouring out of the Spirit, even in his ordinary influences and operations, will always produce a measure of the same effects, as this extraordinary communication did. (Note, Is. 32:15.) It will soon be "noised abroad;" many will be excited to examine into it, and to make their observations; many will be astonished at the change wrought in such persons as were before known to be careless, ignorant, or illiterate, and at the things spoken by them; and they will be led to acknowledge, that there is something real and wonderful in it: others will stand in doubt, and not know what to determine about it: nay, some, more ignorant, self-important, malignant, and daring, will, without hesitation or competent information, even pronounce the whole enthusiasm, delusion, hypocrisy, imposture, or perhaps intoxication, and so treat it with scorn and derision! "But wisdom is justified by all her children." (P. O. Matt. 12:22—30.)

CHAPTER III.

Peter and John, at the temple, heal one who had been lame from his birth, 1—8. The people, being astonished, throng around them, 9—11. Peter declares that this miracle had been wrought by the power, and through faith in the name of Jesus, whom they and the other Jews had delivered to be crucified, but whom God had raised from the dead, 12—16; he supposes that they did it ignorantly, and shows that God had thus fulfilled the Scriptures, 17, 18; he exhorts them to "repent and be converted, that their sins" may be pardoned, and they made partakers of the promised blessing, 19, 20; and refers them to Moses and all the prophets, whose predictions were fulfilled in Jesus the Saviour, whom God had sent to bless them, in turning them from their iniquities, 21—26.

V. 14—21. If we are indeed influenced by the Spirit of truth, holiness, and love, we shall meekly bear, or reply to, the most injurious reflections; assigning the cause of those effects, which excite many and discordant opinions. Thus, even curiosity and malicious reproaches will give the ministers of Christ an opportunity of bearing testimony to the truth, before those who have been strangers and enemies to it. On such occasions, it is peculiarly important for us to show the agreement of our sentiments, mind, heart, and conduct, with the doctrines, promises, predictions, examples, and precepts of Scripture; clearly and strongly arguing from the sacred word, as undoubted truth; and applying every subject, as cogently as possible, to the hearts and consciences of our hearers. To suppose, however, that, now Christianity is publicly professed among us, and we have no longer need of the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, we therefore do not want his sanctifying operations; is as unreasonable, as it would be to argue from the present improved state of agriculture, that the influences of the sun and rain are become unnecessary: and the state of those congregations, where such notions are maintained, too plainly show the real tendency of them. If Peter and Paul should come again on earth to preach the gospel, and to confirm their doctrine with the most undeniable miracles; no saving effects would follow, except the Holy Spirit were given to render the word successful. But, in fact, the whole gospel will seldom, if ever, be faithfully preached, with earnest and faithful application to the heart and conscience; except when the minister is in some good measure enabled to speak, as "the Spirit gives him utterance." Even Peter and the other apostles were manifestly raised above themselves, when thus "filled with the Holy Ghost;" and their singular boldness and liberty, in discoursing concerning the wonderful works of God, as evidently proved that they were supernaturally aided, as the new tongues with which they spake. (Note, Mark 16:17, 18.) Such assistance we may expect, and shall experience from time to time, when called to bear witness to "the truth as it is in Jesus." It should also be noticed, as the evident doctrine of the sacred oracles, that when God so remarkably pours out his Spirit, in abundance of spiritual gifts and graces, on numbers of every rank and station, as to effect a great revival of true religion; it may also be expected, that he will remarkably punish those who persist in neglecting and despising his great salvation. Assuredly, at that solemn period which is so often foretold, and prefigured in Scripture; when "the sun shall" literally "be turned into darkness," and the whole visible creation be destroyed by one common conflagration, to introduce "the great and notable day" of "judgment, and perdition of ungodly men;" none will escape that dreadful condemnation, and the subsequent vengeance, except those who have previously called upon the name of the Lord, in and through his Son Jesus Christ, as the only Saviour of sinners, and the Judge of mankind. But, on the other hand, whosoever of any age, nation, rank, or character, now calls on the name of the Lord, in this appointed manner, shall then be completely saved, and made an heir of eternal life.

V. 22—36. The enmity of the human heart against God appears especially in the scornful hatred, generally manifested against those whom he has most evidently owned and approved. The doctrine, miracles, character, and crucifixion of Jesus form the chief proof of this: but instances confirming and illustrating the same conclusion have been multiplied in every age.—The "determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God" cannot be the motive of men's actions, being wholly unknown by them, or unthought of at the time; and therefore can form no excuse for their sins. In permitting ungodly men to follow their own inclinations, God brings to pass those events which he has purposed and predicted: but his decrees, and their accomplishment, are most holy, wise, righteous, and good; whereas the instruments by which he works are actuated by the basest motives, and aim at the gratification of their worst passions. (Notes, Gen. 50:20. Is. 10:5—7.) This was most evident in the crucifixion of Christ; which, "as appointed of God," was the most glorious display of all the divine perfections, and replete with the richest blessings to mankind; but, as perpetrated by the Jews, it was the grand discovery of human depravity, and in all its circumstances, the greatest single act of wickedness which ever was or can be committed. Men of this character aim to counteract the purposes of God, at the very time when they are accomplishing them: and when he has wrought by them, as long as he sees good, he turns his hand against them to their destruction. As it was "not possible," that the Redeemer should be held under the power of death, though he endured the pain of it; so it cannot be, that the Scripture should be broken, or that his believing people should come short of that blessed resurrection of which he was the glorious First-fruits. After his example, they are taught to "set God always before them," to walk as in his presence in humble obedience, and in confidence that they "shall not be moved." In proportion to the degree of their faith and hope, their hearts rejoice and dictate praises to their tongues.—They too learn to meet death with a comfortable hope, that, though "their flesh see corruption" in the grave, yet it shall not finally be left there, and that their souls shall never experience the miseries of the place of torment. Through their crucified, risen, and ascended Saviour, "the ways of life" are made known to them also; and, from present earnests, they are encouraged to expect that they shall be filled with the joy of God's presence and favour for evermore. (P. O. Ps. 16.) But all this springs from their assured belief, grounded on prophecies, miracles, and abundant external and internal proofs, and the effectual teaching of the Holy Spirit, by these proofs, that Jesus is indeed ascended into the heavens. Pious kings, patriarchs, and prophets of old, looked forward to these events with joyful expectation; and died assuredly believing that the Redeemer would appear to overcome death, and to open the gates of heaven to all that trusted in him. An innumerable company of witnesses testify, that the crucified Jesus was he; and that, being risen from the dead, "he is exalted by the hand of the Father," to communicate all blessings to his people, and to put all his enemies under his feet. Therefore "let all men know assuredly," that Jesus is the Lord and Judge of the whole world, and the anointed Saviour of all who obey him. (Notes, Matt. 13:16, 17. Luke 10:23, 24. Heb. 11:13—16. 1 Pet. 1:10—12.)

V. 37—41. When the solemn truths of Scripture are declared with plain and direct application to the conscience, attended by the convincing Spirit of God, the proud, stout, and hard heart begins to tremble and be disquieted: nor will the salvation and kingdom of "the Prince of peace," ever be welcome to those who never were "pricked to the heart," by humiliating convictions of sin, (generally accompanied with alarm also,) so as to be excited to earnest inquiries, "What shall we do?" (Note, Zech. 12:9—14, v. 10.) But the most desperate enemies, when thus awakened, should be exhorted to repent, and believe in Jesus, and to prove and profess their faith, in the way prescribed by his holy word. Still repentance and remission of sins are preached to "the chief of sinners," in the Redeemer's name: still the Holy Spirit seals the blessing on the believer's heart: still the encouraging "promises are to us, and to our children;" who possess manifold advantages and opportunities, through the faith and obedience of their parents: still the same blessings are sent to "all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call." We should therefore embrace this salvation ourselves: and then, as we have opportunity, and as we are able, we should testify, warn, exhort, invite, and persuade sinners to save themselves from the perverse and crooked generation of those who reject the gospel. But if our teachers and rulers, or a large majority of our neighbours, nay, even if our nearest relatives refuse to go with us in the way to heaven, or would hinder us from going; we must stop our ears to their blandishments, persuasions, reproaches, and persecuting opposition, and escape for our lives from the ruin impending over them.—Under the teaching of the Holy Spirit convinced sinners "gladly receive the word" of salvation, and find "peace and joy in believing;" they boldly profess the truth which before they despised, renouncing worldly interests, pleasures, and companions; and, joining themselves to the Lord and his people, they delight in attending on his ordinances, and in keeping his commandments.

V. 42—47. When shall we behold the whole company of none; [l]but such as I have give I thee: [m]In the name of [n]Jesus Christ of Nazareth, rise up and walk.

7 And [o]he [p]took him by the right hand, and [q]lifted him up and immediately his feet and ancledones receive [r]strength.

8 And [s]he, leaping up stood, and walked, and entered with them into the temple, walking, and [t]aping, [u]and praising God.

9 And all [v]the people saw him walking, and praising God.

10 And [w]they knew that it was he which sat for alms at the Beautiful gate of the temple: [x]and they were filled with wonder and amazement at that which had happened unto him.

11 And as the lame man which was healed [y]held Peter and John, [z]all the people ran together unto them [a]in the porch that is called Solomon's, greatly wondering. [Practical Observations.]

12 ¶ And when Peter saw it, he answered unto the people, [b]Ye men of Israel, why marvel ye at this? [c]or why look ye so earnestly on us, as though by our own power or holiness we had made this man to walk?

13 The [d]God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob, the God of our fathers, [e]hath glorified his Son Jesus; [f]whom ye delivered up, and denied him in the presence of Pilate, when he was determined to let him go.

14 But ye denied [g]the Holy One, and the Just, [h]and desired a murderer to be granted unto you;

15 And killed the [i]Prince of life, [k]whom God hath raised from the dead; [l]whereof we are witnesses.

16 And [m]his name, [n]through faith in his name, hath made this man strong, whom ye see and know; yea, the faith which is by him hath given him this [o]perfect soundness in the presence of you all.

those who have been baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, disposed to copy the example of these first-fruits of the gospel? This specimen of the genuine nature and tendency of Christianity ought carefully to be studied: for unless our views, pursuits, affections, and conduct, in good measure correspond with their's, we have great reason to question whether we be truly believers. Indeed hasty conversions, from one creed or sect to another, are seldom followed by such a steadfastness in faith and practice, "as becomes the gospel of Christ:" yet these things have been, and will again be united; and we must therefore form no general rules without allowing for exceptions. Rather let us diligently copy the pattern here exhibited, and pray without ceasing for the "pouring out of the Spirit," to produce these blessed effects in us and around us: that we too may "continue steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine," and "in fellowship" with all true believers; that our attendance on the Lord's table may be more frequent, serious, and influential, than it generally is at present; that we may abound more in social prayers and supplications for each other, and for the success of the gospel; that we may delight daily in attending to the word of God, when we have opportunity, and leisure from other duties; that we may "use hospitality without grudging," and communicate liberally to our needy brethren; and that "whether we eat, or drink, or whatever we do, we may do all to the glory of God," "in gladness and singleness of heart," at a distance from avarice, selfishness, intemperance, pride, envy, contention, or any of those manifold evils, which corrupt, disgrace, and divide the church of Christ. Thus we shall over-awe our inveterate enemies, even without the power of working miracles: thus we shall "show forth the praises of him, who hath called us out of darkness into his marvellous light;" silence the slanders, and soften the prejudices, of those who are without; and dispose them to favour us, and attend to "the doctrine of God our Saviour." And when the most unlikely persons, (such as the crucifiers of the Lord Jesus,) are transformed by the gospel into harmless, peaceful, loving, and exemplary worshippers and servants of God, it may be expected, that "the Lord will add to his church daily such as shall be saved."—Even those who, like Peter, have been overcome by temptation, to act inconsistently with their holy profession; if indeed they are deeply humbled, and made more bold and zealous for the cause of their gracious Lord: may yet hope to be employed as his instruments in forwarding so blessed a work, for his glory and the salvation of souls. May the Lord then pour out his Holy Spirit on all ministers, Christians, and congregations, for these blessed purposes, till "the earth be filled with the knowledge of his glory!" Amen! and Amen.

NOTES.—Chap. III. V. 1—11. The events, recorded in this chapter and that which follows, seem to have occurred soon after those which have been considered. (Note, 2:44—47.)—The apostles and primitive believers generally attended the temple-worship at the hours of prayer; of which the third and the ninth, or nine o'clock in the morning and three in the afternoon, when the morning and evening sacrifices were offered with burning of incense, were the chief. (Marg. Ref. a—c. 10:3—8. Ex. 29:38—41. 30:1—10. Num. 28:3—8. Luke 1:8—10. Rev. 8:1—6.) The two apostles, Peter and John, seem, however, on this occasion to have gone up to the temple apart from the others; perhaps to seek an opportunity of preaching to the people, as well as to offer their supplications before God. The lame man, healed by them, was above forty years old, and had been a cripple from his birth. (Marg. Ref. d—g. 4:22.)—The Beautiful gate of the temple was erected by Herod the Great: it was above fifteen yards high and about eight yards wide, being formed of Corinthian brass, with the most exquisite workmanship. It is supposed to have separated the court of the Gentiles from the inner court.—The purpose of the apostles to work a miracle in this man's behalf, seems to have arisen from an immediate divine suggestion to their mind.—The declaration of Peter, that he had no silver or gold to bestow, as made after some of the possessions had been sold, and intrusted to the disposal of the apostles, may be considered as a proof, that they were not in the least enriched by the liberality of their brethren.—But, though he could not answer the man's expectations in this way, he was willing to help him, according to the ability committed to him. The circumstances attending this miracle need no comment: we, as it were, see the man making trial of his limbs, and the strength thus unexpectedly communicated to them, in every way which he could imagine; and expressing in the most lively manner his admiring gratitude to God, and his affection for the instruments of this mercy to him. (Marg. Ref. h—q. Notes, 14:8—10. Is. 35:5—7. Matt. 11:2—6.)—Some think, that he held the apostles, as unwilling to part with them, not only from affection, but also from fear, lest when they were gone his lameness should return.—It may be doubted whether, if one, born a cripple, who had never walked, should by ordinary means be immediately restored to perfect soundness, he would be able at once to use his limbs, and to show his vigour and agility in the manner here described.—As it is probable that this man had, for a considerable time, been laid at the gate of the temple; he must often have heard concerning Jesus and his miracles, and perhaps he had seen him and heard his instructions. He had not, however, applied for healing; and it had pleased the Saviour to leave him under his malady, that the miracle performed in this extraordinary case, by the witnesses of his resurrection, might "manifest his glory" more illustriously, than if he himself had wrought it before his crucifixion. (Note, Matt. 21:14—16.)—The multitudes drawn together by the report of this miracle, were probably collected, not only from the courts of the temple, but from the adjacent parts of the city. (Marg. Ref. r—x.)—Solomon's. (11) Note, John 10:22—24.—There is not the least probability in the tradition of the Jews, that this very portico was built by Solomon, and was spared by the Chaldeans, when they burnt the rest of the temple.

V. 12—16. Notwithstanding the multiplied miracles which Jesus had wrought, and the astonishing events which had lately taken place at Jerusalem; the Jews had so little applied their minds to them, that each new miracle excited amazement, as if they had not seen any before, or could not tell what to infer from it. It is indeed probable, that they did not expect to witness any thing of this kind, after Jesus had been put to death. The apostle therefore demanded of them, why they were so astonished at this miracle, when so many others, all combining to prove the same doctrine, had already been performed among them. Or why did they look to him and John, as if they had healed the man by their own power; or as if their own "holiness," or godliness, had given them some peculiar interest in the favour of God? (Marg. Ref. z, a.) For this was by no means the case: on the contrary, "the God of their fathers" had wrought this, and all the other wonders which they had witnessed, in order to honour his Son Jesus, "whom he had glorified" at his right hand in heaven. Indeed they had delivered Jesus as a condemned malefactor to Pilate, "because he called himself the Son of God;" rejecting their promised Messiah, and prevailing with Pilate by importunity to crucify him, when, convinced of his innocence, he "had determined to release him." Nay, at the same time that they thus unanimously and deliberately renounced this righteous Saviour, this "holy One of God;" they had desired the release of a murderer. (Marg. Ref. b—f. Notes, 2:33—36. Matt. 27:19—26. Mark 15:6—10. Luke 23:13—25.) Thus, they had wickedly preferred a wretch who destroyed men's lives, to "the Prince of life;" the Author of life and salvation, from whom alone spiritual and eternal life could be obtained; and they had murdered him by the hands of the Gentiles! But though they had thus atrociously dishonoured the Author of life: (Note, John 1:4,5. 5:24—27. 11:20—27. 14:4—6. Col. 3:1—4. 1 John 1:1,2. 5:11,12.) yet God his Father had raised him from the dead, of which they were witnesses: and the incontestable miracle, which excited their amazement, had been performed by faith in the name of Jesus, and by power derived from him, in confirmation of their testimony to his resurrection and ascension: nor had they done any thing in restoring this cripple to "perfect soundness," except as their faith had relied on the power of Jesus to perform the cure. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. g—l.)—Holiness. (12) 'Here is a plain evidence of the variation of the Roman doctrine, from that of the apostles, assisted by the Holy Ghost: for the apostles here plainly disclaim any excellency or piety in them, which might make them worthy to be God's instruments, above any others, in working such miracles; but the catechism of the council of Trent plainly declares that God confers on us many benefits by the merits of the saints; and Lorinus, on the place, declares, that innumerable histories, and the practice of the church, show that the merits of the saints are prevalent for the working of miracles.' Whithy.—Through faith, &c.] Some expositors interpret this of the faith which the lame man exercised in the name of Jesus; and the probability that he had heard and seen Christ himself, as well as the piety which apparently accompanied his gratitude to Peter and John for his cure, favours the opinion that he was a believer. Yet it does not appear that he previously expected a cure; and the texts referred to, will, I think, convince the attentive reader, that the faith of the apostles was intended. (Marg. Ref. k. Notes, Matt. 21:21,22. Mark 11:20—26.) They had used the name of Jesus in faith; and a divine power had, in answer to their expectations, "given perfect soundness" to one, who had been a cripple from his birth, who was forty years of age, and who was well known to the people. This was designed to show that Jesus was risen; that he was indeed the Messiah, and as such honoured by the God of Abraham; and that the apostles were his servants and witnesses.—Every reflecting person must observe the very great difference which there was in the manner of our Lord's working his miracles, and that of his apostles. His language was that of omnipotence and sovereignty, "I will, be thou clean:" "Peace, be still:" "Damsel, arise." Nor did he ever, except in the case of Lazarus, which has been considered, (Notes, John 11:41—46, vv. 41,42.) even appeal by prayer to his Father, or give the least intimation of any power exerted, except what was inherent in himself. He never hesitated to receive the greatest honour which was rendered on these occasions; he never cautioned any man against supposing that he wrought miracles by "his own power, and to manifest his own glory." (Note, John 2:6—11.) But the apostles wrought their miracles expressly "in his name," and by faith in him: they were afraid of receiving any honour to themselves, except as the undeserving instruments in the hands of Jesus: they referred all the honour to their Lord: and they never mentioned the Father; except to show, that the God of Abraham was fulfilling in "his Son Jesus," the promises made to the patriarchs, and was determined to glorify, in every way, that Person whom the Jews had treated with contempt and indignity. No satisfactory reason ever was, or ever can be, given of this manifest difference; but by allowing that Jesus knew himself to be "One with the Father" and coequal to him; and that the apostles were conscious, that they were weak and sinful men, who depended on Jesus alone for every thing.—His name, &c.] His power accompanying the use of "his name," with "faith in his name:" even "the faith that is by him," effected the cure. V. 17, 18. The apostle, having shown the Jews the atrociousness of their crime, was careful not to irritate them needlessly, nor yet to drive them to despair. He was willing candidly to suppose, that both they and their rulers had done this deed in ignorance. This ignorance indeed resulted from pride, prejudice, and many criminal sources; yet "they would not have crucified the Lord of glory, if they had known him." (Marg. Ref. m, n. Notes, Luke 23:32—38, v. 34. John 19:8—12. 1 Cor. 2:6—9. 1 Tim. 1:12—14. Heb. 6:4—6.) God had, however, in this manner fulfilled the prophecies of the Scripture, concerning the atoning sufferings of their promised Messiah: so that, though "they had thought evil against him, yet God meant it for good."—'Though the ignorance of the whole nation, and especially of the rulers in this case, was such as took away all just excuse in them, on account of their infidelity; (John 15:22—24.) yet, because it was occasioned by those prejudices which they had contracted, through the meanness of his character, and their imagination that Christ should not die, and that his kingdom should be temporal, Christ bears with it, till the time of the effusion of the Holy Ghost; and then calls them again by his apostles to repentance.' Whithy. (Note, Matt. 12:31, 32.)—I wot, &c. V. 19—21. As the sin of the Jews was so undeniable and aggravated, and as there was yet hope for them in the mercy of God, through the Saviour whom they had crucified; the apostle exhorted them to repent, and turn from that, and all their other sins, to the acceptable worship and service of God, by faith in his Son. (Marg. Ref. q, r. Notes, 17:30, 31. 20:18—21. 26:19—23. Ez. 18:30—32. Matt. 3:2. Luke 13:1—5. 24:44—49.) Thus, and thus only, all their sins would be blotted out as a cancelled debt, never more to be charged to their account. (Marg. Ref. s. Notes, Ps. 51:1, 2,9. Is. 43:22—25. 44:22.)—The following words may be rendered, perhaps more clearly, "That seasons of refreshment may come from the presence of the Lord; and that he may send Jesus Christ, who hath before been preached unto you, &c."—'Divine refreshment would no doubt immediately mingle itself with the sense of pardon, and eternal happiness would at length certainly succeed. But the following clause seems to intimate that Peter apprehended that the conversion of the Jews, as a people, would be attended with some extraordinary scene of prosperity and joy, and open a speedy way to Christ's descent from heaven, in order to "the restitution of all things."—I find that the learned Vitringa agrees with me in this interpretation.' Doddridge. The prophets in general predicted, not only glorious times to the church under the reign of the Messiah, but to the nation of Israel when converted to him. (Marg. Ref. y.) That nation had long been harassed and oppressed in various ways, and was at the time when Peter spoke, under the Roman yoke, which was extremely galling: and the wickedness of the rulers and people, in crucifying the Messiah, might seem to have filled up the measure of their national guilt, and ripened them for destruction. But as Jesus, after his resurrection, had directed his apostles to "preach repentance and remission of sins in his name to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem;" (Note, Luke 24:44—49, v. 47.) and as the success of their first attempt had been so signal, and they had hitherto met with no opposition; it is probable, they expected that Christ would soon "restore the kingdom to Israel," having first brought the nation in general to repent and believe in him; (Note, 1:4—8.) and would afterwards, by their means, bring the other nations to embrace the religion of Israel, and so, as proselytes, to seek admission into the kingdom of the Messiah. Then, perhaps, they expected that Jesus would return again from heaven, set up a triumphant kingdom on earth; and destroying all obstinate enemies, would introduce those glorious days, which all the prophets had foretold.—It is undeniable, that the apostles, for a considerable time after the day of Pentecost, did not clearly understand many things relating to the calling of the Gentiles, the rejection of the Jews, and the fulfilment of the prophecies. (Notes, 2:14—21. 10:9—16,44—48. 11:1—18. 15:1—21. Matt. 24:3.) Their minds were enlightened, and their prejudices dissipated; rapidly indeed, yet gradually, and as their present circumstances and duties required. Thus the ancient prophets were inspired to foretell as much as it was proper should at the time be known; yet they did not immediately, or certainly, know the meaning of their own predictions; (Note, 1 Pet. 1:10—12.) and the apostles and primitive Christians, after the event, understood them far more clearly, than the prophets themselves had done. In like manner, after the conversion of Cornelius, and the council at Jerusalem, Christians in general would understand St. Peter's words, concerning the "pouring out of the Spirit on all flesh," more distinctly than he did when he uttered them; and after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the abolishing of the Mosaic dispensation, the surviving Christians would more exactly perceive the meaning of the words before us, than Peter himself did at the time. Our Lord had told the apostles: "It was not for you to know the times and the seasons, which the Father had put in his own power," (1:7.) and there is ground to believe, that this, in many respects, was not clearly revealed to them, but left to be discovered by the event. (Note, 2:14—21.) Had the nation of Israel, as a body, embraced the gospel, "the times of refreshment would have come from the presence of the Lord:" and when the nation shall thus turn to their long-rejected Messiah, those times will come. But the prophets who foretold these events, predicted also a national rejection of the Messiah, and dreadful desolations to the people, with long-continued dispersions. It was not, however, necessary, that the Holy Spirit should on this occasion make known "the times and seasons" of these dispensations; and, without such an immediate revelation, the apostle might expect that these happy times for his nation were at hand. Even to the end of the New Testament, such an obscurity is left on these subjects, that diverse opinions still prevail, in respect of the reign of Christ during the millennium, whether it is to be personal or spiritual; (Note, Rev. 20:4—6.) and his coming to set up his kingdom all over the earth, has been very generally, even by diligent expositors and other learned writers, confounded with his coming to judge the world: and in various other particulars this obscurity and inaccuracy is found. Now, that which was to be obscurely foretold, a prophet or apostle might but obscurely foresee: and the historian merely records the apostle's discourse.

The general meaning of the passage is here compendiously given; but it is not a quotation, properly speaking, either from the Septuagint, or the Hebrew; between which there is no material difference.

V. 24—26. Samuel was the first prophet after Moses, who is expressly mentioned as a writer of the sacred oracles: and from him the schools of the prophets seem to have originated. (Note, 1 Sam. 10:5,6.) It is not necessary to prove that predictions concerning Christ are found in the writings of every one of the prophets, for the words imply a general not a universal, proposition: yet Jonah and Nahum alone appear to be exceptions; for Obadiah certainly is not. The book of Jonah is a history, not a prophecy; and he was a remarkable type of Christ. That of Nahum, is "the burden of Nineveh," and relates expressly as a prophecy to no other subject. (Note, Nah. 1:15.)—The persons to whom the apostle spoke, were the descendants of those to whom the prophets had been sent, and they had inherited from them the deposit of the sacred oracles, as well as the advantages of the covenant first made with their Fathers; especially that of the Messiah's arising from among them, who was the "Seed of Abraham, in whom all the nations of the earth would be blessed." (Marg. Ref. i—m. Notes, Gen. 12:1—3. 22:16—18. Rom. 3:1,2. 9:4,5.) Indeed Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were prophets; (Gen. 20:7. Ps. 105:15.) and the Jews were their children, and heirs of the covenant made with them; unless (like profane Esau) they should despise and refuse their birthright and blessing. (Notes, Gen. 25:30—34. Heb. 12:15—17.) On this account the first proposal of the gospel was ordered to be made to them. For God, having raised up his Son Jesus, to be a Prophet, Priest, and Ruler, a Mediator of a covenant, the Author of a new dispensation, as Moses had been, but in every respect unspeakably superior to Moses. Having therefore raised him from the dead, and placed him upon his glorious throne, he had sent him, by his gospel and by his Holy Spirit, to render them truly happy: not by advancing them to worldly authority and prosperity, as they had vainly expected; but by teaching, encouraging, and enabling them to turn away from all their sins, that they might walk before him, as his accepted worshippers and adopted children, in the light of his countenance, and the enjoyment of his favour. (Marg. Ref. n—q.)—'This chapter furnishes to us additional and very striking views of the admirable spirit which actuated and fully possessed the apostles, after the day of Pentecost. Behold their moderation and their piety, still gladly taking part in the Jewish worship; (1) their simplicity, perfectly willing to be and to pass for poor men; (6) their tenderness to the afflicted; (6,7.) their indifference to themselves, and zeal for their divine Master; (12,13, &c.) their boldness; (13—15.) yet, withal, their candour; (17) and their affectionate compassion for souls. (19,25,26.)—What do we want as Christians or as ministers, but to be formed to such blessed tempers as these, thus happily blended together? And by what means were the apostles formed to them, but by the influence of that same Spirit, who is so firmly promised, and even urgently offered, to "every one" that asks his presence?—This also repels the suspicion of enthusiasm. Where is the waywardness or self-sufficiency of an enthusiast? On the contrary, moderation, candour, and modesty, are united with most decided courage and most fervent zeal, in the conduct of the apostles.

CHAPTER IV.

The priests and Sadducees imprison Peter and John, 1—3. The signal success of their preaching, 4. When brought before the council, Peter boldly declares, that the late cure had been wrought in the name of Jesus, the only Saviour, whom the rulers had rejected, 5—12. The council, unable to answer, dismiss them with a threatening charge to speak no more in the name of Jesus, which they avow themselves bound to disregard, 13—22. They return to their company; and all unite in prayer, for boldness in preaching, and that miracles of mercy might confirm their testimony, 23—30. The house being shaken, they are all filled with the Holy Spirit, and emboldened to speak the word of God, 31. The harmony and charity of the whole company, who had all things in common; the miraculous assistance granted to the apostles; and the pious liberality of Barnabas and others who had possessions, in selling them, to distribute to the needy, 32—37.

Schleusner.—"Blessing you,' in each one turning away from his wickedness." Each, who did this at that time, or does it at any time, is blessed by Christ; but none else. This seems the purport of the words.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. The stated seasons of communion with God, and opportunities of doing good, will be welcomed with alacrity, proportioned to the degree in which we are "spiritually minded:" (Notes, Ps. 84:1,2,10. P.O. Note, 122:1,2.) for the carnal mind alone complains of the tediousness and too frequent returns of these sacred services; as sickly persons even loath the sight of the food, which the healthy relish and enjoy.—Piety and charity should always be connected: those who are disabled from labour ought to be supported by benevolence; but too often, the impositions of the slothful and profligate give selfishness an excuse for turning away from real and known objects of compassion. (Note, Luke 18:35—43, v. 35.)—Poverty and simplicity, and contempt of filthy lucre, in the ministers of Christ, are far better proofs of integrity, than affluence, splendour, and luxury; and, while the Lord employs others as his stewards, in dispensing wealth to relieve the necessities of their brethren; it should not grieve the "steward of the mysteries of God," if he be constrained to say to the expecting poor, "Silver and gold I have none, but such as I have I give unto thee." (Notes, Luke 16:1—13. 1 Cor. 4:1,2. 1 Pet. 4:9—11.) In every case, we ought to impart to others, according to the ability which is given to us; and "if there be first a willing mind, it is accepted" by God, "according to what a man hath, and not according to what he hath not;" and so it ought to be by our brethren. (Notes, 2 Cor. 8:10—15. 9:6—11.)—If we would attempt to good purpose the healing of men's souls, we must go forth in the name and power of Jesus Christ; calling on helpless sinners to arise, and walk in the way of holiness by faith in him. We should indeed show affectionate regard to those whom we address; but nothing effectual will be done, till the Lord puts forth his power; and then the most impotent will receive strength to "walk in newness of life," and show forth the praises of God, by cheerfully joining in his worship, and by cleaving to his ministers and people. Thus the attention of men is excited; facts proclaim the efficacy of the gospel; and every true convert is a monument raised to the honour of the great Redeemer's power and love. (Note, Is. 55:10—13.)

V. 12—18. Those who are honoured with usefulness should be careful to remind the people, that as the effects are not produced by their power, so they are not wrought for the sake of their holiness or piety, but for the glory of that divine Saviour, whom sinners still deny and despise: He is "the Prince of life," and "the Author of eternal salvation to all them who obey him;" (Note, Heb. 5:7—10.) yet what immense numbers prefer the company and favour of the vilest transgressors, and the indulgence of their ruinous lusts, to him and all his blessings. But whether good have been done, or whether we have been enabled to fight successfully against sin and temptation, it has been effected "by faith in his name:" and we must go forth to all our future labours and conflicts, and our efforts to promote the cause of truth and holiness, by the same faith, engaging his almighty arm to work in us, by us, and for us, that he may have all the glory.—Those who reject, refuse, or deny Christ, do it through ignorance of one kind or another: this can in no case be admitted as an excuse; but it alleviates the guilt at some times, far more than it does at others. While unbelievers should be reproved and convicted of their sins, and all the aggravations of them in the plainest and most faithful manner; yet we should admit of any extenuation, which can fairly be supposed; and we should always be careful to show them that the mercy of God in Christ Jesus gives them ground of hope, of forgiveness, and eternal salvation, notwithstanding all their crimes. (Notes, 1 Sam. 12:20. Ps. 130:3,4.)

V. 19—26. Blessed be God, that the sins of all, who "repent and are converted," shall assuredly be blotted out: the connexion is inseparable. (Notes, Matt. 13:14,15. 2 Tim. 2:23—26. Heb. 6:4—6.) The change is indeed wrought by the grace of God: yet the exhortation to "repent and be converted," and the assured promise of forgiveness and reconciliation to God, through Jesus Christ, in case they obey the call, should be general to all without distinction; and all alike should be warned, that except they repent and be converted, neither the mercy of God, nor the blood of Christ, will save them from perdition. When sinners are convinced of these things, they will begin to cry to the Lord, "Turn thou me, and I shall be turned;" "Create in me a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within me." (Notes, Ps. 51:10. Jer. 17:14. 31:18—20. Ez. 36:25—27,37.)—To the penitent, converted, and believing, "times of refreshment will come from the presence of the Lord:" even the seasons of his judgments on the wicked will be attended with consolation to the souls of his people; and the day of judgment, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed to take vengeance on his enemies, will complete their salvation. (Note, 2 Thes. 1:5—10.) That solemn period, when the earth shall be burnt up, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, will be to them "the restitution of all things," "the manifestation of their adoption, and the redemption of their bodies." (Note, Rom. 8:18—23.) but every soul who now refuses to hear, believe, and obey that "Prophet like unto Moses," whom God has raised up unto us, will then most certainly be destroyed from among the people.—Though we are not the children of the prophets, yet we are of those "kindreds of the earth," who are called on to inherit the blessings procured by the promised Seed of Abraham: to us also are "committed the oracles of God;" to us the glad tidings are preached, that God so loved us as to "send his Son Jesus to bless us, in turning every one of us from our iniquities." Let not sinners then imagine, that religion calls them to be uneasy and unhappy; but rather that it kindly offers to guide them to true felicity. (Notes, Ps. 1:1—3. 32:1,2.) Let none suppose that they can be happy, by continuing in sin; when God declares that the blessing consists in being "turned from their iniquities." Let none think that they understand and believe the gospel, who seek deliverance only from the punishment of sin, but do not expect happiness by salvation from sin itself; and let none expect to be turned effectually from their constitutional or customary iniquities, except by believing in Christ the Son of God, being "found in him," "who of God is made to" all believers, "Wisdom, and Righteousness, and Sanctification, and Redemption." (Note, 1 Cor. 1:26—31, v. 30.)

NOTES.—CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. 'Before our Saviour's passion, the chief agents against him were the scribes and Pharisees; but now that the apostles do not only assert the resurrection of our Lord, but "preach through Jesus the resurrection of the dead," (2) the Sadducees, who denied the resurrection of the body, become their fiercest adversaries.' Whitby.—The Sadducees seem to have rapidly increased, among the higher orders, at this time: and as the testimony of the apostles, to the resurrection of Jesus, was subversive of their scheme of infidelity, this was to them an additional reason for opposing their doctrine. (Note, 23:6—10. It could not therefore be expected, but that, on this and on other accounts, the rulers of the Jews would persecute the apostles, as they had done Jesus himself. Accordingly, under the guidance of the person who presided over the guard of Levites, which constantly attended at the temple, they apprehended Peter and John as they were preaching, and cast them into prison; being so late in the evening, that they could not then conveniently proceed against them. (Marg. Ref.)—'Over this guard,' (of Levites) 'one of the priests was appointed captain: and this office, according to Josephus, was next in dignity to that of high-priest.' Campbell. (Notes, 2 Kings 11:4—10.)

V. 4. Some expositors think that five thousand persons were converted on this occasion; but it rather seems, that this number of believers was then completed: for it is not likely, that any one day should be honoured with greater success, than that on which the Holy Spirit first descended: nor do the words convey that idea to the mind, but rather that "the number became about five thousand;" yet they imply that the women and children were not included.

of the kindred of the high-priest, were gathered together at Jerusalem.

7 And [m]when they had set them in the midst, they asked, [n]By what power, or [o]by what name, have ye done this?

8 Then Peter, [p]filled with the Holy Ghost, said unto them, Ye rulers of the people, and elders of Israel,

9 If we this day be examined of [q]the good deed done to the impotent man, by what means he is made whole;

10 Be it [r]known unto you all, and to all the people of Israel, [s]that by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, [t]whom God raised from the dead, even by him doth this man stand here before you whole.

11 This is [u]the Stone which was set at nought of [x]you builders, which is become [y]the Head of the corner.

12 Neither [z]is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name [a]under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved.

[Practical Observations.]

13 ¶ Now when they saw the boldness of Peter and John, and perceived that they [b]were unlearned and ignorant men, they marvelled; [c]and they took knowledge of them, that they had been with Jesus.

14 And [d]beholding the man which was healed standing with them, [e]they could say nothing against it.

15 But when they had commanded them [f]to go aside out of the council, they conferred among themselves, 16 Saying, [g]What shall we do to these men? for that indeed [h]a notable miracle hath been done by them is manifest to all them that dwell in Jerusalem; [i]and we cannot deny it.

17 But [k]that it spread no further among the people, [l]let us straitly threaten them, that they speak henceforth to no man in this name.

18 And they called them, and commanded them, [m]not to speak at all nor teach in the name of Jesus.

19 But Peter and John answered and said unto them, [n]Whether it be right in the sight of God, [o]to hearken unto you more than unto God, [p]judge ye.

20 For [q]we cannot but speak [r]the things which we have seen and heard.

21 So [s]when they had further threatened them, they let them go, finding nothing [t]how they might punish them, because of the people: [u]for all men glorified God for that which was done.

22 For the man was above [x]forty years old, on whom this miracle of healing was showed.

V. 5—12. Caiaphas seems to have performed the ordinary functions of the high-priesthood, and Annas to have had the greater influence and authority in the council. (Notes, Luke 3:2,3. John 18:10—14.)—The other persons here mentioned were doubtless very considerable at that time; but there seems to be little certainty or importance in the conjectures which have been formed about them. "The kindred of the high-priest," must have been different persons from the heads of the twenty-four courses; as many of these were no more his kindred, than all the other priests were: that is, they were descended from Aaron, either by Eleazar, or Ithamar. (Notes, 1 Chr. 24:1—6.)—The examination of Peter and John would excite very great attention; as all parties seem to have considered their interest, authority, reputation, and favourite system to be in the most imminent danger. In the question which they asked, they virtually allowed that an extraordinary cure had been performed: (Notes, Matt. 21:23 —32.) but they inquired, whether it were the effect of a divine power, or of incantation by the use of some "name" according to the notions which then prevailed. Accordingly Peter, "being filled with the Holy Ghost," felt none of those terrors which had formerly led him to deny his Lord; but spoke before that great assembly, with the utmost courage, liberty, and propriety. (Marg. Ref. m—p. Notes, Matt. 10:16—20. Luke 21:12—19, v. 15.) He premised that the action, about which they were cited to answer as criminals, was "a good deed," an act of genuine mercy as well as of divine power: and he would have all the priests, scribes, and rulers, and all the whole nation, to understand, that it had been wrought "by the name," or power, "of Jesus the Nazarene," who was the promised Messiah. (Marg. Ref. q—s. Note, 3:12—16.) They had indeed crucified him as a deceiver, for declaring himself to be "the Son of God:" but his resurrection from the dead, by the power of God, had proved his high claim; and the man, who stood before them, miraculously cured of his hopeless lameness, was a confirmation of their concurrent testimony to that event. Indeed the crucified and risen Jesus was that illustrious person, of whom David prophesied, as of a Stone, designed to be the Cement, Support, and Ornament of the whole spiritual temple; and they were the builders, (by office and authority in the church,) who had set at nought that Stone, and thrown it aside as utterly worthless. (Marg. Ref. u—y. Notes, Ps. 118:19—24. Matt. 21:40—44.)—But, according to that prophecy, he was now exalted to the highest authority in heaven, as the anointed Saviour, and the only Mediator between God and Man: insomuch that there was "no salvation in any other" person, or way, either for the rulers or people; nor "any other name under heaven given among men," by which either he, or they, or any man might be saved from destruction. This plainly intimated, that no man could be saved, except in a way of God's express appointment; and that the rulers themselves must either be saved by Jesus or perish for ever (Marg. Ref. z, a.)—Some learned men have laboured to prove, that healing, or the cure of bodily disorders, is meant in the concluding verse; and not eternal salvation; because the same original word in some instances signifies healing. In fact, it denotes deliverance, whether from disease, slavery, death, or damnation; and the context must fix the meaning. But in this place, the miracle of the man who had been healed, was merely adduced as a proof that Jesus was risen from the dead, and consequently the Messiah, the Son of God, and the only Saviour for sinners. The apostles, the rulers, and audience, did not want miraculous cures of bodily diseases; but they all needed a Saviour and salvation: the name of Jesus is given to men of every age and nation, as that by which alone believers are saved from the wrath to come, and "with an everlasting salvation;" not from bodily sickness and temporal death. Indeed every reader must perceive, what energy there was in the address to the consciences of these persecutors, according to the obvious interpretation of it; and how this vain criticism enervates it, and causes all its spirit and vigour to evaporate.—It is observable, that the rulers never mentioned to the apostles, the report of their having stolen the body of Jesus, though they were so fairly called upon to do it; for they knew it to be a mere falsehood, and probably they acted against their own convictions, in professing a full persuasion that Jesus was not risen. (Note, Matt. 28:11—15.)—The insertion of you, in quoting the prophecy, (11) was very pointed. It was saying to each of them, "Thou art the man." (Note, 2 Sam. 12:7.)—This is the Stone, &c. (13) 'This, for three centuries, was the objection against the professors of Christianity: ... yet it is a great confirmation of the Christian faith; and shows, as Justin Martyr well observes, that it was not of human, but divine original; and that being with Jesus was sufficient to make the ignorant and unlearned wise.' Whitby. (Note, John 7:14—17.)—It is probable, that the council had hoped to over-awe the apostles, into silence and submission: but when they found with what constancy and courage they replied, and with what boldness they charged them with having crucified the Messiah: and when they considered that they were persons of mean education, obscure station, and strangers to the habits of public life; they were greatly surprised, and recollected that they had seen them with Jesus, when they had laid wait to ensnare him as he taught in the temple, or when he was apprehended. (Marg. Ref. b—d.) And, as the man who had been healed was upon the spot, ready to attest the reality of the miracle; they could neither object any thing to the incontestable fact, nor deny the conclusion which was drawn from it. To conceal their perplexity, therefore, they ordered the apostles to withdraw for a while; and, having consulted together what they should do in so difficult a case, they agreed that it would be in vain to deny the miracle; as it was manifest to all men, that it had been wrought by Peter and John in the name of Jesus the Nazarene. It was, however, necessary to do something effectual to stop the progress of a doctrine which tended to bring disgrace upon them, to subvert their authority, and as they imagined, to ruin the nation. (Notes, John 11:47—53. 12:9—11.) They therefore determined, in defiance of conviction, to forbid the apostles, in the severest terms, on pain of their heaviest displeasure, "to preach any more at all in the name of that Jesus," whom they had just before punished as a deceiver; which sentence they resolved to justify and support, by prosecuting those who espoused the same cause. (Marg. Ref. f—m.) To this, Peter and John replied, with great constancy and propriety, by demanding, whether it was reasonable, or "a righteous thing, in the sight of God," to regard the injunctions of men, more than his commandments. They were divinely commissioned and expressly commanded to "preach in the name of Jesus:" and however they might respect the authority, or fear the indignation of the rulers; their inward conviction of the truth and importance of their doctrine, and the remembrance of those things which they had witnessed concerning their crucified, risen, and ascended Lord, and heard from him, would constrain them to declare his name and salvation to all around them. (Marg. Ref. n—r. Notes, Is. 30:8—11. Jer. 26:12—15. 38:1—6. Am. 7:10—17. Mic. 2:6,7. 2 Cor. 5:13—15.)—This bold declaration induced the rulers to add still severer threatenings; but at the same time they dismissed them: for, having no plausible reason to allege, they dared not venture the consequences of punishing them; as the people showed them great favour, and acknowledged the miraculous cure performed, to be a glorious display of divine power and mercy in the midst of them. Indeed the instantaneous recovery of one born a cripple, and now more than forty years old, was a most astonishing effect of divine power! (Marg. Ref. s—u.)—'Not only the energetic and conclusive discourses of the apostles are admirable; but "the meekness of wisdom," united with firmness, which distinguished all their replies;—replies often made to persons whose presence must have been suited to daunt men of their station and their habits. They never shrink, and they are never disrespectful. They refuse to comply with the injunctions of their hostile superiors, no further than they feel themselves compelled to it by the imperious sense of duty. Their coolness, and self-possession, in the presence of persecutors, is not that affected and ostentatious, and of course irritating coolness, which some have displayed; whose conduct has seemed to say, 'See how indifferent we are to you! how much we are your superiors! In fact, how much we despise you! This invites persecution; whereas the apostles always declined and avoided it, if they could.—This smiling self-complacent coolness may be as very a working of corrupt nature, as fleeing from the cross; and not a much more difficult working in certain circumstances. It lives upon its own admiration, and the admiration which it expects from by-standers, food which will support nothing that "belongs to the Spirit."' (Note, Dan. 3:16—18.)—It should be remembered, that this was the first time in which the apostles were called to encounter opponents armed with power. (Note, Matt. 26:69—75.)—Took knowledge. (13) If John was the "disciple who was known to the high-priest;" this language concerning him, as well as Peter, would scarcely have been used. V. 23—28. It is generally supposed, that the company to which the apostles returned, consisted of the hundred and twenty persons before mentioned, who probably were assembled to pray in their behalf. (Marg. Ref. y. Note, 1:15.) Under the impression of the report made to them by Peter and John, and by the influence of the same Spirit, they all united, as with one heart and soul, in prayer to the Lord, the omnipotent Creator of the world; and in doing this, they introduced with peculiar propriety a prophecy concerning the Messiah, which God had "spoken by the mouth of his servant David."—Before our Lord's crucifixion, the apostles had overlooked all the predictions of this kind; but now they remembered and clearly understood them. (Marg. Ref. z—e. Note, Ps. 2:1—3.)—The language used in applying this prophecy to Jesus, may refer to his immaculate conception by the Holy Spirit. Thus he received his human nature perfectly holy; and the unction of the same Spirit preserved that holiness, in full perfection, through all the temptations and trials of his life and death. This aggravated the guilt of those who hated and opposed the "holy Child" and righteous Servant of God. Yet both Herod the tetrarch or king of Galilee, who professed the Jewish religion, and all the rulers of God's chosen people, and Pilate who was a professed idolater, with the bulk of the Jewish nation, as well as the Gentile attendants on Pilate, had united together to treat him with the utmost cruelty and contempt. (Marg. Ref. f—k. Notes, Matt. 27:24—44. Luke 23:1—25.) But they in this were only led to "whatsoever his hand and counsel had determined before to be done." (Marg. Ref. Notes, 2:22—24. Luke 22:21—23.)—'The truth is clear, that God decreed that these things should be done; although he decreed not that the Jews should do them: but only permitted them to do what he foresaw they would, if they were thus permitted.' Hammond. It is then clear, that God, foreseeing this, decreed to permit them.—'As St. Peter and St. Paul, by calling the Jews to repentance for this sin, in crucifying the Lord of life, do evidence that their sin was not the less, because they did by it fulfil the counsel of God's holy will, and kind intentions to mankind; so they consequently evidence, that God's foreknowledge and determination of a thing future, does not impair the liberty of men's wills in the accomplishment of it; as all the ancient fathers have declared in this particular.' Whitby.—'We must not consider their work, who were wicked murderers, and profane enemies of the truth; but the work of God, which they fulfilled, without thinking of any such thing. This distinction, rightly observed, will satisfy all moderate men, that they should never separate the counsel and decree of God, from his decreeing foreknowledge; and yet that they should fix all the blame of crimes on second causes, on the devil, for instance, and man. Thus God hardened Pharoah: thus the king of Assyria was a saw, which God used: thus God gave to Absalom his father's wives: thus God called the revolt of the ten tribes his work: thus the wicked, by whom David was troubled, were the hands of God: thus Caiaphas prophesied: thus finally, "God worketh all things according to the counsel of his own will."' Beza. (Notes, Gen. 50:20. Ex. 2:5—9. Ps. 76:10. Eph. 1:9—12, v. 11.)—Why did, &c. V. 29—31. The disciples were fully persuaded, that the rage of their persecutors would be restrained and overruled for good: and they did not pray to be protected; but to be endued with boldness, to declare their doctrine openly, and with liberty, energy, and plainness of speech, at all events; (Marg. Ref. n, o. Notes, Eph. 6:18—20. Col. 4:2—4.) and that it might be confirmed, as of divine authority, by continued miracles being wrought in the name of Jesus. Though they had been greatly injured, and severely threatened; and could not but know, that those who had crucified their Lord, sought to destroy them also; they yet prayed that God "would stretch forth his hand," not to perform miracles of vengeance, as many wrought by Moses were; nor yet to defend them; but "to heal:" for love to the bodies and souls of men had supplanted their selfish passions, and meliorated their zeal, since the time when they desired permission to call down fire from heaven on the Samaritans. (Marg. Ref. p, q. Note, Luke 9:51—56.)—Some expositors have thought that this prayer was immediately addressed to the Holy Spirit; by whose power the human nature of Jesus was formed in the womb, and who was the immediate Agent in the miracles performed by the apostles. But this is not evident: and indeed there are few passages of Scripture, in which the Holy Spirit is expressly prayed to, personally, separately, and distinctly: perhaps, as prayer is presented both by and for the Holy Spirit, it may be the less proper to address it to him, except as one with the Father and with the Son, in the unity of the Godhead.—These petitions, however, were immediately granted: the place, in which the disciples were assembled, was shaken, probably as it had been on the day of Pentecost by "the rushing mighty wind:" (Note, 2:2,3.) and they were all evidently filled with an abundant communication of the Holy Spirit, in all his enlivening, sanctifying, and comforting influences; as well as in respect of the extraordinary powers imparted to them: so that without delay, they proceeded to "preach the word with all boldness;" not at all dismayed by the menaces of their powerful enemies. V. 32—35. Not only the company to whom Peter and John returned, but the whole multitude of believers, were thus united in judgment and affection, as one body animated by one soul; so that hitherto no controversies, jealousies, or murmurs were known. (Notes, 2:44—47. 6:1. Jer. 32:39—41. Ez. 11:17—20. John 17:20—23. Eph. 4:1—6. Phil. 2:1—4.)—"And great grace was upon them all." Some interpret this of the great favour shown the Christians by the people in general; but the phrase is different from that before used. (2:47. Luke 2:40,52.) The special favour of God manifested to them: and the powerful effects of his sanctifying grace, in forming them to be such holy, lovely, and happy characters, seem to be especially intended.—The language used, concerning the liberal communication of all the property of the more affluent, with their poor brethren, who were thus exempted from all want; and of their confidence in the disinterested faithfulness of the apostles is suited, as by a specimen, to show, what Christianity would effect, in meliorating the condition of mankind, if universally and cordially embraced. V. 36 37. Perhaps Barnabas was one of the seventy disciples; he became afterwards so eminent as to be spoken of as an apostle. (14:14.) It is probable, that his name was given him on account of his talent, in exhorting and encouraging sinners to come to Christ, and believers to cleave to him in the midst of persecution. (Marg. Ref. g—k. Note, 11:22—24.) The estate which he sold was an inheritance that he possessed; and not any land which he held as a Levite by purchase, or by inheritance. As Barnabas was born in Cyprus, perhaps the estate lay there: but that is not said. The money, which probably was a considerable sum, was "laid at the apostles' feet," who for a time took the charge of distributing it: but it was soon found expedient to employ others in that service. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. The zeal of avowed infidels to make proselytes, and their unwillingness that others should believe a future state of retributions, seem at first sight unaccountable: for if this be a delusion, it can do men no harm; if their sentiments be true, they can do no good. But the honour of being thought wiser than others, and qualified to undeceive a deluded multitude, has abundant charms for the vainglorious mind. Moreover, infidels have their misgivings, and firmly believe their own reasonings only in proportion as others seem convinced by them: when therefore contrary doctrines are taught with confidence and success; they are secretly alarmed, lest after all they should find themselves mistaken. But, whether the motive be regard to authority, or interest, or reputation, or superstition, or inward quietness, or all combined; ungodly men will be grieved when the gospel is successfully preached, and their vices and errors exposed: and ministers may generally expect contempt and persecution from unbelievers, of discordant principles and parties, in proportion as God honours and prospers them; yet "the gates of hell can never prevail against the church" of Christ.—The harmless and useful servants of God have often been indicted as criminals, for "their work and labour of love," when profligates have escaped with impunity, and ungodly priests and elders, and their connexions, have commonly been most forward in these prosecutions. Nay, to this day, instances are not wanting, in which reading the Scriptures, social prayer, and religious conversation meet with frowns and checks; when indolent, and dissipated, profligate, heretical, if not openly infidel churchmen escaped uncensured, or are distinguished by preferments! If, however, we observe the instructions and obey the precepts of Christ, he will bear us out; and the teaching of his Spirit will render the most timid bold in his cause.—The despised Redeemer must be confessed before his most malignant enemies, by all who would be owned by him before the assembled world: (Note, Matt. 10:32,33.) and if they, who are builders by office, reject this precious Corner-stone of the living Temple; we must, when called to it, fairly show them their folly, guilt, and danger, how much soever they may resent it: for assuredly "there is no salvation in any other; nor any other name given to men," by which any one, "under the whole heaven," can be "delivered from the wrath to come," from sin and Satan, and all evil, and made partaker of eternal glory.

V. 13—22. Those who boldly declare the truths of Scripture, will commonly be considered as "unlearned and ignorant men;" while they "determine to know nothing but Christ crucified;" but if they speak and act as those who "have been with Jesus," who have imbibed his instructions and spirit, and learned to copy his example; they will, by well doing and sound argument, put gainsayers to silence. Yet this comes far short of converting them: for when avarice, ambition, or any corrupt passion rules within, men shut their eyes and close their hearts in enmity against the light; and determine to bear down, if they can, by authority and violence, what, in their consciences, they perceive to

CHAPTER V.

Ananias and Sapphira, combining to tempt the Holy Spirit by a lie in respect of land sold by them, at Peter's word fall down dead, 1—11. The apostles work many and great miracles, and have much success in their ministry, 12—16. The rulers cast them all into prison, 17, 18. An angel releases them, and directs them to preach openly in the temple, 19, 20. They are at length brought before the council; and, being examined, they boldly bear testimony to Jesus as exalted to be a Prince and Saviour, 21—33. The rulers, being "cut to the heart," purpose to slay them, but are restrained by the counsel of Gamaliel, 33—39. The apostles are beaten, and dismissed with injunctions not to speak any more in the name of Jesus, 40. They rejoice in their sufferings, and proceed diligently in preaching Jesus the Christ, 41, 42.

[a]BUT a certain man named Ananias, with Sapphira his wife, sold a possession;

2 And [b]kept back part of the price, [c]his wife also being privy to it, and brought a certain part, [d]and laid it at the apostles' feet.

3 But Peter said, Ananias, [e]why hath Satan filled thine heart to *lie to the Holy Ghost, and [f]to keep back part of the price of the land?

4 While it remained, [g]was it not thine own? and after it was sold, was it not in thine own power? [h]Why hast thou conceived this thing in thine heart? [i]thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God.

5 And Ananias, [k]hearing these words, fell down, and gave up the ghost: [l]and great fear came on all them that heard these things.

6 And the young men arose, [m]wound him up, and carried him out, and buried him.

7 And it was about the space of three hours after, when his wife, not knowing what was done, came in.

8 And Peter answered unto her, Tell me whether ye sold the land for so much? And she said, Yea, for so much.

9 Then Peter said unto her, [n]How is it that ye [o]have agreed together [p]to tempt the Spirit of the Lord? Behold, [q]the feet of them which have buried thy husband are at the door, and shall carry thee out.

10 Then [r]fell she down straightway at his feet, and yielded up the ghost: and the young men came in, and found her dead, and, carrying her forth, buried her by her husband.

11 And [s]great fear came upon all the church, and upon as many as heard these things.

bear the stamp of truth and divinity. (Note. John 3:19—21.) But whatever deference be due to rulers, chief priests, and councils; we must not hesitate to declare, that we will "obey God rather than man," and venture all consequences in so doing; yet this should always be done with modesty, meekness, and unaffected reluctance to disobey our superiors, in church or state. Indeed, when the heart is powerfully influenced by heavenly love and zeal, and the understanding clearly perceives the importance of the truth and the line of duty, a man "cannot but speak" what he has seen and learned: he has a moral inability to refrain; his holy principles have a commanding influence over him, superior to the tyrant's frown, or the terrors of persecution; and as far as God has work for such a man to finish, he will restrain the wrath of his most potent enemies, or turn the tide of popular favour in his behalf, as he sees good. (Notes, Jer. 20:7—9. 2 Cor. 5:13—16.)

V. 23—37. Believers may, in various ways, be confined among those who fear not God: but, "being let go, they will return to their own company."—Whatever trials we meet with, fervent prayer is our never-failing resource; and the more we unite in it, as "with one heart," the more signal answers may be expected. All things are alike easy to him, who made the heavens, and the earth; vain therefore must be the devices, which princes or people, how powerful or numerous soever they be, can imagine against the Lord, and his anointed Saviour; for when power, policy, and tumult, have done their utmost, they have but effected what "the hand and counsel of the Lord had determined before should be done:" in effect, they have only digged a pit for their own destruction; and rolled a stone, which will rebound upon them, and crush them to pieces.—He knows the power and rage of our foes; and we should not so much pray for exemption from trials, and protection from dangers, as for grace to enable us steadily to do our duty, and to glorify our God in the midst of them all. Our prayers should especially be presented in love, even for our bitterest persecutors; we should request that the Lord's "hand may be stretched out to heal" and to save, not to avenge and destroy. Thus we may expect to be effectually answered, and to be filled with inward confidence and comfort, amidst all outward tribulations.—But let us carefully consider the effects produced by the pouring out of the Holy Spirit, in those blessed days, when "great grace was upon all" the company of believers. They were "all of one heart and soul;" they had but one common interest to attend on; their love to the brethren was united with equal contempt of worldly riches and disregard to worldly interests and indulgences; so that the poorest had no want, the wealthiest no exclusive possessions. When such dispositions prevail, and are exercised according to the circumstances of the times, the testimony of ministers will have a peculiar energy upon the minds of their hearers; especially if their own conduct exhibits an example of integrity, disinterestedness, and love: and if it be evident that, like their Master, they deem it "more blessed to give than to receive." (Note, 20:32—35.)

NOTES.—CHAP. V. V. 1—11. The reputation acquired by those who sold their estates must have been very great: so that it is not wonderful, that the ambition of this honour, should, in some instances, overpower the fear of persecution, in the hearts of those who were not upright in the sight of God. But the increase of professed Christians of this character would have disgraced the cause, and spread an infection in the church. The Lord was therefore pleased to check this evil, at the opening of the New Testament dispensation; as he had others, at the promulgation of the law, and the first entrance of Israel into the possession of the promised land. (Notes, Lev. 10:1—11. Josh. 7:)—Ananias and Sapphira, seeing how those persons were respected who had parted with their whole substance, to supply the wants of their poor brethren, agreed together to sell the land, to secrete a part of the money, and to give the rest to the apostles as the whole price. In doing this, they perhaps expected to have a maintenance from the common stock, and yet to reserve a part of their substance to themselves: but the desire of reputation seems to have predominated. (Marg. Ref. a—d.) Peter, however, was immediately shown the deception which they were practising, and charged it upon Ananias in express terms. (Notes, 2 Kings 5:20—27.) His language on this occasion implied, that, whatever Satan might suggest, he could not have "filled the heart" of Ananias with this wickedness, had he not been consenting. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. e, f. Notes, John 13:1—5, v. 2. 18—30, v. 27.) The falsehood told to the apostles was a bold attempt to impose upon "the Spirit of truth" himself, who so manifestly spoke and acted by them: and this was to "lie unto God," and not unto men; which is a plain testimony to the Deity and personality of the Holy Spirit.—The estate continued Ananias's property, even after his profession of Christianity; the sale of it was not a matter of compulsion, but of voluntary choice; and even the money, after it was sold, was at his own disposal: whence it appears, that this liberality was not expressly required of the primitive Christians, but was the result of their abundant zeal and love. So that the crime of Ananias did not so much consist in retaining part of the price of the land, as in endeavouring, in so solemn a transaction, to impose upon the apostles with a deliberate pertinacious lie, the result of avarice combined with ostentation. (Marg. Ref. g—i.)—As his death was the immediate effect of divine power, and merely denounced by Peter, it struck terror into all who heard of it; and he was buried immediately in his own garments, without further preparation or mourning; as Sapphira was afterwards, when, persisting in the same horrid falsehood, she was struck dead by the awful judgment of God. (Marg. Ref. k—s. Lev. 10:4—6. Notes, 2 Kings 1:10. 2:23,24. 2 Cor. 13:7—10.)—This apparent severity on two detected hypocrites, was real mercy to numbers: it excited a reverential fear and a holy jealousy in the whole company; it doubtless brought them to strict self-examination, prayer, and circumspection, and a dread of hypocrisy, covetousness, or vainglory: it prevented the increase of scandals in the church, and the intrusion of hypocrites; and thus it conduced to render the gospel honourable in the eyes of the people.—We may also observe, that this event was a divine attestation to the apostles' integrity and veracity, fully intelligible by their enemies. God would never have inflicted such a judgment, at their word, upon inferior dissemblers, if their testimony to the resurrection of Jesus had been a deception: and it showed that they would not connive at iniquity in those of their own party, or for the sake of their private interest, or that of the society.—Many expositors suppose, that Ananias had made a vow, (either publicly or secretly,) to give his estate for the support of the Christian cause; and that sacrilege was the crime for which he was visited: but the history never mentions this. He had, from corrupt motives, attempted to impose upon the apostles and upon the Holy Spirit; and his 12 ¶ And [t]by the hands of the apostles were many signs and wonders wrought among the people; (and [u]they were all with one accord [x]in Solomon's porch:

13 And of the rest [y]durst no man join himself to them: [z]but the people magnified them.

14 And [a]believers were the more added to the Lord, [b]multitudes both of men and women;)

15 Insomuch that [c]they brought forth the sick [d]into the streets, and laid them on beds and couches, that, at the least, the shadow of Peter passing by might overshadow some of them.

16 There came also a multitude out of the cities [e]round about unto Jerusalem, [d]bringing sick folks, and them which were vexed with unclean spirits: and they were [e]healed every one.

[Practical Observations.]

17 ¶ Then [f]the high-priest rose up, and [g]all they that were with him, (which is the sect of the Sadducees,) and were filled with [h]indignation, 18 And [h]laid their hands [o]n the apostles, and put them in the common prison.

19 But [i]the angel of the Lord by night opened the prison-doors, and brought them forth, and said, 20 Go, [k]stand and speak in the temple to the people [l]all the words of this life.

21 And when they heard that, [m]they entered into the temple early in the morning, and taught. [n]But the high-priest came, and they that were with him, and called the council together, and all the [o]senate of the children of Israel, [p]and sent to the prison to have them brought.

22 But when the officers came, and found them not in the prison, they returned, and told,

23 Saying, [q]The prison truly found we shut with all safety, and the keepers standing without before the doors: but when we had opened, we found no man within.

24 Now when the high-priest, and [r]the captain of the temple, and the chief priests heard these things, [s]they doubted of them whereunto [t]this would grow.

25 Then came one and told them, saying, [u]Behold, the men whom ye put in prison are standing in the temple, and teaching the people.

26 Then went the captain with the officers, and brought them without violence: (for [x]they feared the people, lest they should have been stoned:)

27 And when they had brought them, [y]they set them before the council: and the high-priest asked them, wife had joined him, in this impious and hypocritical attempt. —The Papists adduce this passage as a proof that the successors of Peter (that is, the pope and the ecclesiastics devoted to him) are invested with the secular as well as spiritual sword. Let them, therefore, use the weapons of Peter, whenever they will, but none else; and let them see whether the same effects will follow.—Tempt, &c. Ref.* p. Notes, Ex. 17:1,2. Matt. 4:5—7.)—The case, however, of Ananias and Sapphira was very peculiar, and their guilt exceedingly atrocious.—This single example of severity was made, not on avowed enemies and persecutors, but on false friends. Thus Judas, not Caiaphas, was marked out by his awful end, as the first object of divine vengeance on the murderers of Christ. (Note, Matt. 27:3—5.)

V. 12—16. While just punishment was in one instance miraculously inflicted; the power of God, by the hands of the apostles, was continually exerted in multiplied miracles of mercy. (Note, 4:29—31.) The whole company of believers were as firmly attached to the apostles, and united to each other, as they had been before: and they constantly met, at stated times, "in Solomon's porch," to join in the worship of God; when, probably, the apostles preached and wrought miracles, as opportunity was given them. (Note, 3:1—11, v. 11.) But none of those, who were not willing to renounce all things for the sake of Christ, ventured to join them; though they were greatly honoured by the people in general, and numbers of real converts were continually added by baptism to the church, and by faith to the Lord. (Marg. Ref. y—b.)—Join himself, &c. (13) 'As if he had been a believer, and by way of putting a cheat on the apostles. Such unbelievers as were displeased with the apostles, and hated the cause, would have been glad to put any trick upon them, that they might thereby lessen their esteem among the people; yet durst not: seeing it might prove no less than fatal for any to go about to deceive them.'—Indeed the power of God so evidently attended the apostles, that the people, both in Jerusalem and from the adjacent towns, applied for miraculous cures, by laying their sick in "every street;" (Marg.) that the "shadow of Peter," as he passed along, might fall upon them, from which they expected the benefit: nor were any of them disappointed. (Marg. Ref. c—e. Note, John 14:7—14, v. 12.)—As Peter was the readiest speaker, and stood foremost in every transaction, and as he was one of the first who experienced persecution; it seems that he was more noticed by the people than any of the other apostles, in these miracles. (Note, 19:8—12, v. 12.) 'Hence it is ridiculous to argue, that one or the other (Peter or Paul) was prince of the apostles, or that the relics of holy men are to be venerated. Whitby.

V. 17—25. These transactions could not but perplex and enrage the high-priest and his party; whether their personal interests and reputation, or religious prejudices, or their political views, were considered: especially that prevailing party, which had adopted the heresy of the Sadducees, must foresee the ruin of their sect, as the consequence of the success of the gospel. (Note, 4:4.)—They therefore imprisoned all the apostles, as disturbers of the public peace, in the common jail designed for malefactors. (Marg. Ref. f—h.) But an angel, unperceived by the keepers, set them at liberty, and ordered them to go boldly into the temple, and proclaim to the people "all the words of this life;" that is, the whole gospel of him who is "the Way, and the Truth, and the Life;" by which alone sinners can obtain eternal life. (Marg. Ref. i—l.) This direction was intended, as an exception to the general rule before given by our Lord, that "when persecuted in one city they should flee to another;" which present circumstances required for the triumph of the gospel, the encouragement of believers, and the confusion of their enemies. (Notes, 8:1. Matt. 10:23.) Accordingly, the apostles obeyed without hesitation; and the report brought to the council evidently showed, that their deliverance had been miraculous, and that they were not at all afraid of their persecutors. (Marg. Ref. m—u. Notes, 12:18,19.) The council assembled on this occasion, (21) seems to have included many who did not generally attend, and who indeed were not stated members of the Sanhedrim. V. 26. 'Tyrants not fearing God, are constrained to fear their own subjects.' Beza. (*Marg. 29 Then Peter and the other apostles answered, and said, [c]We ought to obey God rather than men.

30 The [d]God of our fathers [e]raised up Jesus, whom [f]ye slew and hanged on a tree:

31 Him [g]hath God exalted with his right hand to be [h]a Prince and [i]a Saviour, for [k]to give repentance to Israel, [l]and forgiveness of sins.

34 Then [r]stood there up one in the council, a Pharisee, named [s]Gamaliel, [t]a doctor of the law, had in reputation among all the people, [u]and commanded to put the apostles forth a little space;

35 And said unto them, Ye men of Israel, [x]take heed to yourselves what ye intend to do as touching these men.

36 For before these days rose up Theudas, [y]boasting himself to be somebody; [z]to whom a number of men, about four hundred, joined themselves: who was slain; and all, as many as [a]obeyed him, were scattered, and brought to nought.

37 After this man rose up [a]Judas of Galilee, in the days of the taxing, and drew away much people after him: [b]he also perished; and all, even as many as obeyed him, were dispersed.

38 And now I say unto you, [c]Refrain from these men, and let them alone; [d]for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought:

39 But [e]if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it; lest haply ye be found even [f]to fight against God.

"Repent, and believe the gospel," is the call, exhortation, and invitation to all men; and none but the penitent do truly believe. (Notes, Matt. 3:2. 5:3.) Through this exalted Prince and Saviour, the Israelites, and even the rulers who had crucified him, were encouraged to repent, by the proposal of forgiveness; and suitable instructions, motives, and exhortations were given them. Thus he gave them "place," for repentance; in which sense the phrase, here employed, has it seems been once used by Josephus. Yet it is the evident doctrine of Scripture, (Marg. Ref. k. Notes, 11:18. Jer. 31:18—20,31—34. Ez. 11:17—20. Zech. 12:9—14. 2 Tim. 2:23—26.) and likewise of our liturgy, that true repentance is "the gift of God;" and to exclude this most obvious meaning of the words, as many expositors do, is, in fact, an attempt to improve the language of Scripture, and to obscure one evidence of our Saviour's Deity, and of all salvation coming wholly from his fulness of grace. 'Repentance was not indeed actually wrought in Israel, by his efficacious grace;' that is, not in all Israel; for it certainly was in great numbers: but if any who heard the apostles were convinced that they must repent or perish, yet found their hearts still hard and their wills rebellious; was it not a most important and seasonable instruction, to be assured, that Jesus was exalted "to give repentance," as well as pardon to the penitent? that, as one with tears cried to him, "Help my unbelief;" they might cry to him, "Turn thou me that I may be turned:" "Pour on me the Spirit of grace and supplications, that I may look unto thee, whom I have pierced, and mourn" with "that godly sorrow, which worketh repentance unto salvation."

V. 33—39. (Note, 2:37—40.) The rulers were cut by the words of Peter; they were convicted, tortured, enraged, and alarmed, but not humbled or changed: 'they gnashed their teeth, as if one drew a saw;' (Beza;) and therefore they desperately counselled, or resolved, to put the whole company of the apostles to death. But Gamaliel (whose reputation is very high among the Jews to this day, and who seems to have been a man of great judgment and prudence in secular matters) cautioned them against so violent a measure. Probably at this time he had some conviction of the truth of the gospel: but, as he was the teacher of Saul, who was a determined persecutor, it may be questioned whether he long retained his tolerating principles. (Marg. Ref. r—t. Note, 22:1—5.) However, Gamaliel was a Pharisee, and as such, a decided opposer of the Sadducean system, and so more ready to take this view of the subject: and from some recent instances, he fully proved that the interposition of the council in so decided a manner, was neither needful nor safe. (Marg. Ref. u—b.)—'Here Gamaliel affirms two things. First, that before those days, in which that council was assembled, arose Theudas:... whereas the Theudas, mentioned by Josephus,... arose, and perished by the hands of Cuspius Fadus, in the fourth year of Claudius, that is, ten years after the meeting of this council. Secondly, he affirms, that Judas of Galilee, arose after him, and yet he arose "in the days of the taxing," which was under the emperor Augustus, and so thirty-four years before this council, and so this Theudas must have been at least thirty-five years before.... Origen, who had read Josephus, and declares that he examined things relating to the Scripture,... out of a love to truth, speaks thus: 'We say that there was one Theudas before the birth of Christ, who among the Jews declared himself to be somebody.' And again, 'that Judas Galileus, and Theudas who was before him, being not of God, perished.' And a third time, 'Because they gathered from the Scriptures, that the time of the Messiah was come; first Theudas, and after him Judas, tumultuated in the time of the taxing.' Hence do the fathers unanimously say, that those words of Christ, "All that came before me were thieves and robbers," relate to these two, Theudas, and Judas of Galilee; which shows their belief, that both of them were before the time of Christ's preaching. So that it is extremely evident, that the ancient fathers agreed in this, that there was a Theudas pretending to great things, even before the coming of our Lord; though Josephus has taken no notice of him.' Whitby.—Dr. Lightfoot supposes, that the Theudas, mentioned by Josephus, was the son of this Theudas; and that he took his name, as engaging in the same enthusiastic attempts. (Note, Luke 2:2.)—St. Luke merely records Gamaliel's speech; and it is indisputable, that he spake of facts well known to his hearers. As to Josephus, his mistakes and omissions are so numerous and palpable, that his authority ought not to be opposed to other authentic histories; or to facts which at the time were known and allowed to have occurred.—From these premises, however, Gamaliel justly inferred, that if the apostles were employed in propagating an imposture, it would at length be detected, and "come to nothing;" without the rulers incurring the hatred and resentment of the people, by contending against it. But, on the other hand, if indeed it were the cause and work of God, which they were not fully sure it was not, they could not possibly prevail against it: for if they put the apostles to death, some other persons would be raised up to carry it on: at the same time they would be "found to fight against God," and would thus bring upon themselves his omnipotent vengeance. (Marg. Ref. c—f. Notes, 9:3—6. 23:6—10.)—According to this opinion, which was the verdict of common sense, and supported by the most conclusive arguments, the continuance of Christianity to this day, a religion, neither supported by human authority, nor paying court to any man's corrupt passions; nay, opposed by all the power, wealth, philosophy, learning, superstition, idolatry, open profaneness, false religion, vices, and popular prejudices, of the whole world; and declaring exterminating war against all the corrupt propensities of the human heart, without favouring one more than another; and, also the ruin of the Jewish church and nation, and other persecuting powers, are irrefragable demonstrations, that it was "no work or counsel of men," but indeed a revelation from God; and, that those who opposed it actually fought against him, and incurred his righteous displeasure for so doing.—How different the introduction of Christianity in the world, and its preservation and continuance to this day, from those of Paganism and Mohammedism!

V. 40. The whole council, apparently with great reluctance, yielded to Gamaliel's advice, and did not proceed to put the apostles to death: yet their enmity and rage so far prevailed, that they ignominiously scourged them for disobedience to their former orders, and renewed their prohibition of preaching any more in the name of Jesus. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 4:13,22, vv. 18—21. Matt. 10:16—18. 23:34—36. John 19:1—7. 2 Cor. 11:24—27.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16. No state of the church has yet occurred entirely free from hypocrites, and other evils resulting from human depravity and the subtlety of Satan: nor is there any thing so excellent, which artful men will not counterfeit, to gratify their avarice, or their love of applause and honour from men. But the conduct of numbers, even in external duties, by doing some things, and shrinking from others, proves their insincerity; and shows, that they aim to reconcile the service of God and mammon, and the reputation of piety with the interests of the world. (Notes, Matt. 6:1—4,24. Jam. 1:5—8.) When Satan is permitted thus "to fill the hearts" of deceivers with wicked devices; they attempt, and often successfully, to impose upon the ministers of Christ; while he, their Judge, "who hath the keys of death and hell," sees all their secret wickedness, and prepares to expose and punish it.—And does not the narrative, with which this chapter opens, most solemnly warn us, to watch against and subjugate all our passions; not only the violent and disgraceful, but the plausible likewise, the love of money and of reputation, the ambition, not only of honour from worldly men, but also of consequence in the church?—Deceit and lies are, in all things, hateful to the God of truth; but most of all, when introduced into the immediate concerns of religion. How then must he abhor those lying professions, subscriptions, and engagements, which numbers continually make at his table, or when they enter into the sacred ministry! Surely it may be said to every one who acts in this manner, "Why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the Holy Ghost?" "Why hast thou conceived this thing in thine heart? Thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God." If any of us are conscious of having committed so enormous a crime, let us be thankful, that the doom of Ananias has not been ours and let us show our deep repentance, by keeping at the utmost distance from a repetition of the atrocious provocation.—Those who combine together, and encourage one another, "to tempt the Spirit of the Lord," may expect to be joined in the same awful punishment: and when notorious criminals escape with present impunity, they are only "reserved to the day of judgment," for more tremendous vengeance. But, on special occasions, the Lord interposes in an extraordinary manner, to detect such offenders, as are about to become a snare to some, and a scandal to others. This righteous severity often proves an important benefit to multitudes; by putting them on their guard against hypocrisy, and exciting them to watchfulness and prayer.—Whatever conduces to the purity and reputation of the church, eventually promotes its enlargement. When unsound professors of the gospel are excluded or detected, the surest method is taken to bring in an increase of true believers: and, if the apparent severity of reproof or censure, which ministers must at some times necessarily exercise, be connected with manifest and enlarged benevolence; that unfavourable impression, which might otherwise be made upon the minds of men, will be prevented; and they will notwithstanding possess confidence and affection. But that power alone, which wrought such astonishing miracles by the hands of the apostles, (though exercised in a different way,) can rescue any of our apostate race from the power of sin and Satan, and add them as believers to the company of spiritual worshippers. God will, in some degree, work by all his faithful servants; and every one who applies to him, in humble faith, shall certainly be healed, as to the dire maladies of his soul.

V. 17—32. How wretched must they be, whose vexation is increased by the success of the gospel! They may grow more violent in enmity and opposition: but in vain will they attempt to confine those whom the Lord wills to be at liberty; to slay those whom he wills to live; to disgrace those whom he wills to honour; or even to distress or affright those whom he wills to be joyful and courageous. (Notes, 16:25—28 35—40.) His mighty angels delight to minister to his persecuted servants; and at the least intimation of his purpose, they are equally ready to destroy their persecutors. (Notes, 12:5—11,20—23, v. 23.) As long therefore as we are preserved in life, we should go on with our several duties; and those who are called to "preach the gospel," should be "instant in season and out of season," without yielding to fear, or self-indulgence, in preaching "all the words of this life" to mankind.—How vain, yet how obstinate, is the contest, which men maintain against their Creator! They see, at times, that the word and hand of the Lord are against them, and they tremble for the consequences; yet they will proceed! And, after all their convictions, they are more restrained by the fear of man, than by the "fear of him who is able to destroy body and soul in hell!" Men of this character have often opposed their mandates and authority to those of God, and accused the most exemplary and peaceable ministers, of sedition and rebellion; because their doctrines tended to expose the wickedness of their opposers, in its proper colours, to mankind. We must, however, adhere to our principles: "We ought to obey God rather than man;" and they who persist in opposing Christ and his cause, must bear the blame. He is a gracious Saviour to all those who submit to him as a Prince; and he will employ all his power to protect and exalt them likewise. He delights in forgiving the penitent, yea, in "giving repentance and remission of sins" to all the Israel of God; nor will he withhold these inestimable gifts from any who seek to him for them. But he will surely destroy all those "who will not have him to reign over them:" this every man will perceive, in proportion as he regards the testimony of his apostles; and of the Holy Spirit whom God has always given as the Teacher, Sanctifier, and Comforter of those who obey his beloved Son.

V. 33—42. While the convincing arguments of the persecuted, and their own reproaching consciences, increase the rage of determined enemies; the Lord still varies his methods of defeating their malignant purposes. He has all hearts in his hands: and he sometimes uses the candour and sound

CHAPTER VI.

On occasion of the murmurings of the Grecians, seven persons, chosen by the church, under the direction of the apostles, are appointed by them to superintend the daily ministration to the poor; that none might be neglected, and that the apostles might "give themselves to the word of God and to prayer," 1—6. The word of God greatly prevails, 7. Stephen, full of faith and the Holy Spirit, confutes those who disputed against him, 8—10. They suborn witnesses, who, before the council, falsely accuse him of blasphemy against the law and the temple, 11—14. His face shines like the face of an angel, 15.

AND in those days, [a]when the number of the disciples was multiplied, [b]there arose a murmuring of the [c]Grecians against the [d]Hebrews, because [e]their widows were neglected in [f]the daily ministration.

2 Then [g]the twelve called the multitude of the disciples unto them, and said, [h]It is not reason that [i]we should leave the word of God, and serve tables.

3 Wherefore, [k]brethren, [l]look ye out among you seven men of [m]honest report, [n]full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom, [o]whom we may appoint over this business.

4 But we will [p]give ourselves continually to [q]prayer, and to the ministry of the word.

5 ¶ And [r]the saying pleased the whole multitude: and they chose [s]Stephen, a man full of faith and of the Holy Ghost, [t]and Philip, and Prochorus, and Nicanor, and Timon, and Parmenas, and Nicolas, [u]a proselyte of Antioch; policy of learned and eminent men, who do not embrace the gospel, to moderate the counsels of outrageous and irrational opposers. Common sense suggests a caution to every considerate man, to take heed to himself what he does, respecting those who so much as appear to be the servants of God. Experience and observation determine, that the success or reputation of religious impostures, not supported by human authority, or by flattering men's vices and corrupt affections, will be short-lived. The abettors of all such designs have recourse to unhallowed means to gratify their ambition, or to compass their secular designs. Many have drawn the sword in this cause, and have perished by it; some have been scattered; and others have exposed their iniquity to the whole world: so that "every counsel, or work, which is of men," will in one way or other "come to naught."—But while the teachers of religion are harmless and peaceable members of the community, and appear zealous for the truths and commandments of God, according to their views of them; the caution is universally to be regarded, "Refrain from these men, and let them alone:" neither deride, revile, molest, nor injure them; from personal dislike, or from political jealousy. If they are insincere or erroneous, they will in time appear to be so; and no other means should be used, except calm discussion and kind usage: but if their cause be that "of God, it cannot be overthrown," and all who attempt it, will be "found to have fought against God."—But when the enmity of the carnal mind is restricted in its exercise, and cannot, or dare not, vent itself in bloody persecution; it seeks gratification, by dealing in reproaches, calumnies, menaces, insults, and other injuries. We should, however, "rejoice to be counted worthy" to endure shame and pain in that cause in which "Jesus endured the cross, and despised the shame," and for the sake of so gracious and glorious a Benefactor. (Note, Heb. 12:2,3.) We should daily endeavour to recommend him, and his salvation, to all around us: and, whether ministers labour in public, and preach to large congregations, or resort to the houses of their friends and brethren, Jesus, the anointed Saviour of lost sinners, should be the great subject of their instructions, the centre of all their doctrines, exhortations, and encouragements, and the favourite theme of their social conversation.

NOTES.—CHAP. VI V. 1. "The Grecians," or Hellenists, were Jews, or proselytes, who, having generally resided in other countries, spoke only the Greek language, and used the Greek version of the Scriptures in their synagogues; by which they were distinguished from those who spoke a dialect of the Hebrew.—The accession of numbers to the church, perhaps chiefly from among the poor, might render it more difficult, than at the first, to afford them all so plentiful a support, as would have been desirable: (Marg. Ref. a. Notes, 2:44—47. 4:32—35.) and, as the greatest part of the public stock must have been contributed by the Hebrews; perhaps those who acted under the apostles in this business, thought it right to show more favour to the poor widows of that description, than to the others: but we may also suppose, that the Grecians were rather too jealous, and suspected more partiality than there actually was. Murmurs, however, and discontents, having been thus excited, the most dangerous disputes and divisions might have ensued, as has frequently happened in great revivals of religion, to the immense detriment of the common cause: and even the apostles themselves might have been exposed to censure or suspicion; but they being directed by the Holy Spirit, took a most effectual method to prevent these pernicious consequences. V. 2—6. (Notes, Ex. 18:13—26. Num. 11:11—17. Deut. 1:12—18.) The apostle stated to the church, or congregation of believers, whom they called together for that purpose, that it was not reasonable for them to leave their important ministry, to superintend the distribution of their bounty, and see the tables of the poor supplied: and as these murmurs had not arisen through their fault, so they could not consistently attend to the proper means for preventing them. (Marg. Ref. g—r.) It would therefore be most proper, for the church to elect suitable persons, to lay out their contributions in the most satisfactory manner; both among the poor, and in other necessary expenses. They therefore counselled them to "look out seven men," (as sufficient for the present,) of known probity and integrity, and "full of the Holy Spirit;" and they would set them apart for this service, and commit the whole business to their management; that they (the apostles) might have no interruption, in giving themselves up to the preaching of the gospel, and to prayer for its success. This proposal giving them universal satisfaction, the choice was immediately made, and the apostles solemnly set apart the persons chosen for the work, by prayer and imposition of hands.—We read nothing more concerning any of them, except Stephen and Philip; (Marg. Ref. s—u. Notes, 8—15. 7: 8: 21:7—14.) unless Nicolas ("a proselyte," as distinguished from those who were of Jewish extraction) were the founder of the heretical sect, called Nicolaitans, which is not at all probable. (Note, Rev. 2:14—16.) All the names seem to be of Greek original; and perhaps they were chosen from among the Hellenists, to give the more entire satisfaction.—It is evident, that they were appointed to take care of the property of the church, and not to the pastoral office; and the argument hence deduced to prove that every congregation ought to choose its own spiritual pastors, or for popular elections of ministers in any way, proves nothing. Men are generally careful enough to intrust their property in the hands of suitable persons; but their souls are seldom more in danger, than when they follow "teachers after their own hearts."—Beza indeed seems to think, that if the apostles would not appoint deacons, except by the choice of the church, much less would they ordain ministers, or spiritual pastors: but this only proves, that scriptural ground for that plan, which he zealously supported, was not easily found, and that arguments were scarce.—Whatever may be said about the expediency or inexpediency of these arrangements; the divine authority of them should be considered as another question. It must, however, be allowed, that matters are far removed from what is reasonable, scriptural, or profitable, respecting the general management of these most important concerns, in almost every part of the visible church; and that pastors should not be forced on congregations, against whom they can bring just and reasonable objections, whether in respect of doctrine or character.—It has been generally taken for granted, that these seven persons were ordained, or appointed, to the office of "deacons;" yet they are not so called, either in this chapter, or elsewhere: and as the word rendered "deacon" is often translated servant, or minister, and used concerning Christ himself; (Rom. 15:8. Gr.) some have questioned whether there were such a distinct order in the church, during the times of the apostles. Nothing, however, can be more evident, than that such an order existed, and was well known, when St. Paul wrote his epistle to the Philippians, and his first epistle to Timothy. (Notes, Phil. 1:1. 1 Tim. 3:8—13.)—'Now if they' (the deacons,) 'were not instituted here by the apostles, I desire to know when, where, and by whom, they were instituted, and what other record we have left us of such an institution of them.' Whitby. I then, the office of deacons was instituted on this occasion, it seems undeniable, that they were appointed solely to take care of the temporal concerns of the church; and not, as deacons, to preach, or to administer sacred ordinances, except by assisting the elders, presbyters, or bishops, as some think they did, in distributing the bread and wine at the Lord's supper.—'This is as true of the deacons, mentioned by St. Paul; (1 Tim. 3:) there is not a word said of their ministering at the altar.' Whitby. He might have added, or of their preaching.' Yet it is plain, that Stephen did preach, and that Philip both preached and baptized; and he is even called "the evangelist." (21:8.) It therefore occurs to inquire, whether they were preachers of the gospel before their appointment as deacons, or became preachers afterwards. The following remarks are of some importance in this question. 'The choice was committed to them;' (the laity;) 'yet this was done, 1st, by the particular appointment of the apostles; for "the twelve called the multitude, and said unto them, Look ye out seven men." 2dly. They specify the number, and the qualifications, of the persons to be chosen to this office. 3dly. They reserve to themselves the appointment of them to this work: saying, "Look ye out seven men, whom we may appoint over this business." And, lastly, "they only laid their hands on them." So in the case of the rulers over thousands, &c. ... Moses saith, as here, "Choose to yourselves men of wisdom and understanding, and known to your tribes; ... and I will set them to be your heads." Accordingly he both appointed them, and instructed them in the discharge of their office. (Deut. 1:13—17.) It seems very unlikely, that the apostles would have made this one requisite of the persons to be chosen, that they should be "full of the" extraordinary gifts of the "Holy Ghost;" ... if their office had confined them to the ministry of the widows at Jerusalem. ... Being "men full of the Holy Ghost;" and of that wisdom which enabled them to teach others; we cannot reasonably conceive, that they were disabled by their ordination to this office, from doing that work for which they were fitted, and as it were appointed, by these gifts of the Spirit conferred on them. In a word, it is evident from this history, that before the ordination of these deacons, the apostles themselves were engaged in this work; for the treasure of the church was "laid at the apostles' feet, and distribution was made of it to every man according as he had need." This distribution, therefore, must be made by them, who had this treasure in their hands; and therefore they appoint these seven over this business, to ease themselves of this trouble, that they might "give themselves" more entirely "to prayer and to the ministry of the word." ... Now surely that work which the apostles personally performed for a season, must be consistent with their commission to "teach and baptize all nations."' Whitby. This statement does not prove, what the learned author seems to have intended, that the deacons as such, were appointed to preach and baptize: but, to me at least, it renders it highly probable, that some of the seven were previously ministers, or evangelists; and that they spared time from the ministry of the word, for this service, as the apostles had done before the appointment of these assistants. Some of the fathers assert, that they were all of the number of the seventy disciples: but of this there is no other proof. In the abundance of spiritual and miraculous gifts, communicated at this favoured season, it is highly probable, that many were thus qualified for important services, who had not at present a call or opening to perform them. The apostles, in counselling the church, make no distinction between such as had been employed in the ministry, and others: and probably some of each were chosen. Stephen and Philip, we may suppose, were of the former; and when Stephen was martyred, and Philip fully engaged at a distance, others might be chosen as deacons. And it appears to me very likely, that, both at this and future periods, many who were appointed deacons in the first instance, afterwards became evangelists or pastors; and when they were fully employed, other deacons were appointed. (Note, 1 Tim. 3:8—13.)—Let it be especially noted, in this connexion; that those who claim to be, exclusively or particularly, the successors of the apostles, should be more excluded from temporal concerns, and all secular avocations, than even other ministers are, "that they may more entirely give themselves to prayer and the ministry of the word."—Laid their hands, &c. (6) 'The Christian church observed this rite, both in ordaining ministers, and in conferring the gifts of the Holy Spirit.' Beza. (Marg. Ref. x. Notes, 8:14—17. 1 Tim. 5:21,22.)

V. 7. 'A happy event of a time of trial.' Beza.—The triumph of divine grace in the conversion of "a great company of the priests;" considering the heavy loss which they must in consequence sustain, as excluded from the emoluments of the priesthood; and the persecution to which, in an especial manner, they must be exposed from the unbelieving priests and rulers, in addition to their peculiar prejudices against the gospel; has appeared to some expositors too extraordinary to be at all probable; and they propose, without authority, to alter the text, and to read, "and a great company, with some of the priests, were obedient to the faith." But that divine illumination and grace, which caused Saul the persecutor "to count all but loss for Christ;" and when "he had suffered the loss of all things, to count them but dung that he might win Christ," would be sufficient for these priests also. (Notes, Matt. 13:44—46. Phil. 3:8—11.) Indeed, the triumph of the gospel, without this, would in some respects have been incomplete; and it does not become us, either to alter the Scriptures, or to veil the glory and splendour of divine grace.—There were several thousands of priests in the days of Ezra: (Ezra 2:36—39.) and a great company might embrace the gospel, and yet a large majority might persist in unbelief.—The abundant proof, in every way given, that Jesus was the Messiah, could not fail to convince the understanding of numbers among the priests and rulers; and by the grace of God, many of these acted according to their convictions: "with the heart they believed unto righteousness, and with the mouth made confession unto salvation." (Notes, 26:24—29. John 12:42,43. Rom. 10:5—11.)—It seems probable, that some of these converted priests became ministers of the gospel: yet no intimation is given in the New Testament, of any priest, of the family of Aaron, being employed as a Christian minister. John the Baptist was a priest; Barnabas was a Levite: but nothing else, in this respect, is said either of priests or Levites. It may, then, be a matter of inquiry, whether this circumstance were not intentionally ordered, to mark, not a gradual transition, but an immediate and entire change, in the external administration of the church. (Notes, Is. 61:4—6. 66:19—23.)

V. 8. 'It appears plainly from the foregoing history, that it was not as a deacon, that he' (Stephen) 'preached: but the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit he received, eminently qualified him for that work. And no doubt many Christians, not statedly devoted to the ministry, and whose furniture was far inferior to his, would be capable of declaring Christ and his gospel to strangers, in an edifying and useful manner, and would not fail accordingly to do it, as Providence gave them a call and an opportunity.'. Doddridge.—'He that will plead a commission from God to preach the gospel, without an ordinary mission, must show the like extraordinary gifts or miraculous assistances: God never sending any person to do his work, without some testimony from himself, or from persons commissioned by him.' Whitby.—It is most likely that Stephen was previously a preacher; but if he was not, it can hardly be supposed that he would undertake that important office, however qualified, at Jerusalem, and amidst the apostles, without their sanction; or that others, in such circumstances, would do this. At the same time, it must fairly be allowed, that extraordinary cases may arise, which would justify the dispensing with ordinary rules; and remarkable persons may be raised up, though not endued with miraculous powers, who may be fully warranted to teach the ignorant, not only privately, but in the most public manner; though not expressly appointed to the ministry. It is certain that John the Baptist wrought no miracles: yet his ministry (as entirely distinct from the priesthood) was from God, without any human appointment: and it is far from clear, that all the prophets wrought miracles; indeed it is recorded of only a few of them that they did; and they were not sanctioned, but opposed, by the stated ministers of religion: yet their calling was divine. This appeared by the agreement of their instructions with the Scripture, and by the effects of their labours. General rules, however, though they admit of some exceptions, form the measure of our conduct in all ordinary cases: and it is extremely dangerous to give a kind of unlimited sanction to all who suppose themselves, or are supposed by their favourers, to be qualified for the public ministry, to engage in it, without any appointment from the church and its ministers. V. 9—14. There were a number of synagogues at Jerusalem, belonging to different descriptions of strangers residing there; several of whom were proselytes, and not of Jewish extraction. (Marg. Ref. e—k.)—"The libertines" seem to have been the descendants of persons who had been slaves, and had obtained their freedom: though some think that they were Jews, who were admitted to the privilege of Roman citizens; but the word, I believe, is never used in that sense. Each of these synagogues had an academy belonging to it, where students were instructed by some Rabbi: so that these teachers, or their more forward scholars, seem to have challenged Stephen to a disputation concerning his doctrine. But they were baffled by him in argument: for he had not only truth on his side, and eminent abilities; but the Lord had endued him by the Holy Spirit, with such wisdom, judgment, temper, and utterance, as they could not withstand. (Marg. Ref. m. Notes, Matt. 10:19,20. Luke 21,12—19.) Instead, however, of yielding to conviction, they bribed certain unprincipled persons to accuse him before the people and the rulers, as an enemy to the Jewish church and nation: so that he was violently apprehended, brought before the council, and charged with blasphemy; for having said that Jesus of Nazareth (whom they mentioned with the utmost contempt) had declared that he would destroy the temple, and abrogate the Mosaic law. No doubt Stephen foretold that Jesus would destroy the city and temple, in case the nation of the Jews persisted in opposition to him: but the apostles did not understand till long after, that the Mosaic law was to be abrogated; so that this was their inference from his doctrine: and as the temple and city had before been destroyed, and yet the ritual law of Moses had not been altered; this inference was precarious, and their testimony false. (Marg. Ref. o—v. Notes, Is. 64:9—12. Jer. 7:12—15. 26:9. Dan. 9:25—27. Mic. 3:8—12. Zech. 11:1—3. 14:1—3. Matt. 26:57—62.) There was, however, no blasphemy in the words, if he had really spoken them; for they were literally verified a few years after, according to predictions of the ancient prophets, and the types of the law itself, when rightly understood, as well as the predictions of our Lord. V. 15. When the members of the council steadfastly looked on Stephen, to observe whether he showed any signs of guilt or terror, they saw his countenance calm and serene and irradiated, probably in a miraculous manner, as the face of Moses had been when he came down from the mount; so that he appeared more like an angel than a man, as he stood before them. But, as they disregarded all the other miracles, so they remained unmoved even by this divine attestation to his character. It is remarkable, that he who was accused of blaspheming against Moses, should, in the presence of those who "sat in Moses's seat," be thus honoured; even as that lawgiver had been, when he came down from the mount of God. (Marg. Ref. Ex. 34:29—35. 2 Cor. 3:7—18.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. Unless partial and carnal self-love could be wholly destroyed out of every heart; envies, murmurs, jealousies, and discontents will creep in, and, in some degree, disturb every community on earth, however collected and governed. We need not then be surprised to find such things: they belong to human nature: apostolic administration could not wholly exclude them; and that, even among persons endued with great grace. It is indeed, exceedingly difficult o exclude gross evils, even where the most of those concerned are earnestly desirous of doing it. And as it is not to be expected, that the administration of affairs, either in nations, or in any part of the visible church, will be conducted with apostolic disinterestedness, wisdom, and sanctity; the subject before us may serve to repress our murmurs against governors, and established authorities, though we cannot cordially approve of their measures: for unreasonable expectations always end in bitter disappointments. We should, however, repress the first risings of selfish passions in our own hearts; and endeavour to prevent them in others, or to remove all occasions of them from others as far as we can: and, if they begin to appear, such concessions and regulations should be made, without delay, as may disappoint that enemy, who thus seeks to divide the house and kingdom against itself. (Notes, Matt. 12:25,26. Gal. 5:13—15.) In general the ministers of Christ should leave to other men, as far as they can, the management of secular concerns, even such as belong to the church, or to charitable institutions; that they may keep clear of all suspicion of partiality or injustice, and be more at leisure, and unincumbered in attending to their proper office. But, if it be unreasonable and sinful for them to "leave the word of God," even to superintend the care of the poor, and those secular concerns which have an intimate connexion with piety and charity, how inexcusable must they be, who leave the public ministry and even the care of the poor and sick, to others, and waste their times in dissipated pleasures, luxurious indulgence, ambitious and covetous pursuits, or such studies as are foreign to the clerical profession! or who spend their time, abilities, and zeal, in political disputes!—If men are not qualified even "to serve tables," or regulate charities, except they be of "honest report," and endued with heavenly wisdom and grace: how pernicious must it be, to commit the important trust of "watching for men's souls" to such persons as are evidently destitute of these endowments! It therefore behooves those who are concerned in choosing, appointing, or ordaining men to any office in the church, to do it with good advice, serious deliberation, and fervent prayer for divine direction. (Notes, 1 Tim. 5:21,22,24,25.)—When proper methods have been taken to prevent disputes, and to preserve the peace of the church, and to secure an upright, impartial, and prudent management of all her concerns; and when pastors are left at liberty, and are zealously willing "to give themselves continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the word;" it may be expected that the cause of truth will gain ground, that the number of disciples will be multiplied, and that even the most prejudiced will be won over to embrace the gospel: and when priests, or teachers, or leading persons, who have been blind, prejudiced, or careless, "become obedient to the faith;" it may be considered as a peculiar triumph of divine grace, and a most important advantage to the church.

CHAPTER VII.

Stephen, being required to answer before the council, shows how God called Abraham, and promised Canaan to him and his seed, 1—8; how Joseph was sold by his brethren, and Jacob with his family went down into Egypt, 9—16; that when they were oppressed by the Egyptians, Moses was born, and brought up by Pharaoh's daughter, 17—22; that, attempting to deliver Israel, he was rejected, and fled into Midian, 23—29; that at length he was sent to be their deliverer, 30—36; that he prophesied of Christ, received the law for Israel, and was grieved by their rebellion and idolatry, 37—43; that they had "the tabernacle of witness," till Solomon built the temple, 44—47; yet, according to the prophets, "the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands," 48—50. Heboldly accuses the council and the nation of imitating the rebellion and persecution of their ancestors, who rejected and slew the prophets; and charges them with murdering Christ, in violation of their own law, 51—53. Being "cut to the heart," they hasten to stone him; while he, favoured with a vision of Christ, and calling on him to receive his soul, and pardon his murderers, falls asleep, 54—60.

V. 8—15. Those who are full of faith will be full of power; not indeed for working miracles, but to resist temptations, to endure hardships, and to perform arduous services: (Notes, Heb. 11:) and, when the Saviour calls men forth to contend earnestly for the truth; he "will give them a mouth and wisdom, which all their enemies shall not be able to gainsay or resist." But worldly disputants, when thus disconcerted, commonly have recourse to other weapons, to defend their errors, and to gratify their deep resentment. In ordinary cases, ridicule and abuse may suffice; but when enmity to the gospel concurs with indignation at being defeated in a vainglorious contest, a more base and injurious method of revenge will frequently be devised.—How irrational a creature is man! To assert, that an intelligent being is capable of deliberately supporting a system of religion, by subornation, perjury, lying testimony, and murder, might have been deemed a libel on human nature, and on reason itself, had it not been done in numberless instances. But the blame rests not on the understanding, so much as on the heart, of a fallen creature, "which is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." (Note, Jer. 17:9,10.)—Those who prefer human traditions and reasonings to divine revelation, will frequently charge those with blasphemy, who "speak according to the oracles of God;" and most injurious false testimony is often borne, through prejudiced conclusions from men's words, or wrong constructions put on them. But the servant of the Lord, possessing a clear conscience, a cheerful hope, and divine consolations, may smile in the face of danger and death; and may appear amidst his most furious persecutors, not only as "a lamb in the midst of wolves," but even as an angel surrounded with malignant demons.

NOTES.—CHAP. VII. V. 1—8. (Marg. Ref. a.) This speech of Stephen may be considered, either as an answer to the accusation brought against him, or as his testimony to Jesus Christ: and the same arguments would serve both purposes. As he was not permitted to conclude; so we have here rather an introduction to his main subject, than the whole of his intended discourse. (Notes, 51—53. 17:30,31. 24:24—27. 26:24—32.)—There was peculiar wisdom in referring to the ancient records of the nation, and in speaking honourably of those characters, for which his hearers professed so great a veneration, and so strong an attachment; though they neither understood the general plan of the Lord's dealings with their ancestors, nor entered into their views, nor copied their examples. The animation and beauty of the address must be, in a great measure, lost to us, unless we could place ourselves exactly in the situation of the Jews, and appropriate, as it were, their peculiar sentiments and feelings on these subjects. Stephen was accused of predicting the abrogation of the ceremonial law, as if the intimation of such a change was blasphemous: whereas, in fact, the best and most eminent persons among their ancestors lived before the promulgation of that law; which could not therefore be essential to the acceptable worship of God. This seems to have been covertly insinuated, in the beginning of his discourse, which Stephen opened in the language of respect, deference, and affection. He observed, that "the God of glory," who is altogether glorious, and the Fountain of glory, and who had shown his visible glory in the camp of Israel, in the tabernacle, and in the temple, first appeared to Abraham, not in Canaan, to which they thought his peculiar presence limited, but in Mesopotamia. (Notes, Gen. 11:26—32. 12:1—3. Josh. 24:2. Heb. 11:8—10.)—As the history has already been considered, I shall here only advert to those things which involve difficulty, or form an essential part of Stephen's argument. (Marg. Ref.) Both "Ur of the Chaldees," and Charran, or Haran, were, properly speaking, in Mesopotamia; though Haran was much nearer to the promised land than Ur was.—It is here peculiarly noticed, that, when the promise of Canaan to Abraham's posterity was given, he had neither any possession in the land, even so much as to be able to set his foot down, except on the land of others; nor had he any children to inherit, if he had had any possession. (5)—From the calling of Abram, to the Exodus, or departure out of Egypt, was four hundred and thirty years. Twenty-five elapsed before Isaac was born; and tradition reports that he was five years old when weaned, and when Ishmael, who was of Egyptian extraction by his mother, mocked him. The apostle considers this as a species of persecution, and many date these four hundred years from that event. (Notes, Gen. 15:12—16. 21:8—12. Ex. 12:40.)—"The covenant of circumcision," is that covenant, which was sealed by circumcision, above four hundred years before the promulgation of the Mosaic law. V. 9—13. Joseph was the peculiar favourite of God, and an eminent type of Jesus; yet his brethren hated and envied him: but they were not able to prevent his exaltation, which was the means of their own preservation. The argument of this passage seems to be, that, as the patriarchs must have perished, if Joseph, whom they had envied and injured, had not been advanced to authority, and thus enabled to preserve them; so must the Jews and their rulers perish, unless Jesus, whom they had despised and crucified, but whom God had highly exalted, should graciously save them. As therefore Joseph's brethren at length submitted to him, and were forgiven; so ought they to submit, and seek forgiveness from the glorified Messiah. (*Marg. Ref. V. 14. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Gen. 46:7,12,15,21,27.) Seventy persons, including Jacob and Joseph, and Joseph's two sons, are reckoned up by Moses; among whom were some grandchildren of Benjamin, who was not above twenty-five years of age, when Jacob went down into Egypt. And several grandchildren of Joseph are named in Chronicles, who are not mentioned in Genesis. (1 Chr. 7:16,20.) It is undeniable, that some of the grandchildren of Jacob's sons, who afterwards became heads of families in their tribes, were included in the number stated by Moses: and is it not the most obvious way of settling the difficulty, between his account, and that of Stephen from the Septuagint, to include five grandchildren of Joseph? Some learned men indeed would make up the number by the wives of the patriarchs: but it must have been very extraordinary at least that, with so many sons and grandsons, there should have been no more than five women! and, if there were many more, why should five only be here added to the number? Only two females (Dinah, and Serah, a descendant of Gad,) are mentioned in Genesis: and the Septuagint, which Stephen, (who probably was a Grecian, Notes, 6:2—6.) seems to have referred to, may be thus translated: "All the souls which came with Jacob into Egypt, who came out of his loins, apart from the wives of Jacob's sons, all the souls were threescore and six." But the sons of Joseph, who were born to him in the land of Egypt, were nine. "All the souls of the house of Jacob, who went down with Jacob into Egypt, were threescore and fifteen souls."—Joseph, and his two sons, and Jacob himself, complete the threescore and ten of our version: and though the Septuagint is not very accurate or perspicuous in this statement, three things are sufficiently clear: 1. That the

15 So [k]Jacob went down into Egypt, [l]and died, he, and our fathers,

16 And [m]were carried over into Sychem, and laid in [n]the sepulchre that Abraham bought for a sum of money of the sons of [o]Emmor, the father of Sychem.

17 ¶ But [p]when the time of the promise drew nigh, which God had sworn to Abraham, [q]the people grew and multiplied in Egypt,

18 Till [r]another king arose, which knew not Joseph:

19 The [s]same dealt subtilely with our kindred, and evil-entreated our fathers, so that they cast out their young children, to the end they might not live.

20 In which time [t]Moses was born, [u]and was [v]exceeding fair, and nourished up in his father's house three months:

21 And [x]when he was cast out, Pharaoh's daughter took him up, and nourished him [y]for her own son.

22 And Moses was [z]learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, [a]and was mighty in words and in deeds.

23 And [b]when he was full forty years old, [c]it came into his heart [d]to visit his brethren the children of Israel.

24 And [e]seeing one of them suffer wrong, he defended him, and avenged him that was oppressed, and smote the Egyptians:

25 For [f]he supposed his brethren would have [g]understood, how that [f]God by his hand would deliver them; [g]but they understood not.

26 And [h]the next day he showed himself unto them as they strove, and would have set them at one again, saying, Sirs, [i]ye are brethren; why do ye wrong one to another?

27 But [k]he that did his neighbour wrong thrust him away, saying, [l]Who made thee a ruler and a judge over us?

28 Wilt thou kill me, as thou didst the Egyptian yesterday?

29 Then [m]fled Moses at this saying, and was a stranger in the land of Madian, where he begat two sons. [Practical Observations.]

30 And [n]when forty years were expired, [o]there appeared to him in the wilderness of Mount Sina [p]an Angel of the Lord [q]in a flame of fire [r]in a bush.

31 When Moses saw it, he wondered at the sight: [s]and as he drew near to behold it, the voice of the Lord came unto him, 32 Saying, [t]I am the God of thy fathers, the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. [u]Then Moses trembled, and durst not behold.

33 Then said the Lord to him, [x]Put off thy shoes from thy feet: for the place where thou standest is holy ground.

additional five mentioned in it were not women. In fact with what propriety could the wives of Jacob's sons be said to come out of his loins? 2. That they were sons, or male descendants, of Joseph. And, 3. That the family of Jacob, containing some born in Egypt, and Joseph who was carried thither long before, as well as Jacob and those who went down with him, are included.—'Reckoning some of the children born in Egypt, together with Joseph and his sons, and his sons' sons, made up seventy-five persons.' Hammond.

V. 15, 16. (Notes, Gen. 46:—49:) It appears from this passage, and it is indeed highly probable in itself, and confirmed by ancient tradition, that the bodies of all Jacob's sons were embalmed, and carried up by their descendants, to be interred in Canaan. (Notes, Gen. 50:24—26.) Jacob was buried in the cave of the field of Machpelah, with his fathers, Abraham and Isaac. (Notes, Gen. 49:29—31. 50:1—14.) This Abraham bought of Ephron the Hittite. (Notes, Gen. 23:) But Joseph, and probably his brethren, were buried at Sychem, or Shechem, in the piece of ground which Jacob bought of the sons of Emmor, or Hamor, the father of Shechem; and which he left as an inheritance to the descendants of Joseph. "Jacob died, he and our fathers, and they" (our fathers) "were carried over to Sychem and buried, he" (that is Jacob,) "in the sepulchre which Abraham bought for a sum of money; and they" (the other patriarchs,) "in that of the sons of Emmor, the father of Sychem." This rendering has been proposed by several eminent men, to remove the obvious difficulty of reconciling the passage with the history in the book of Genesis. (Gen. 33:19. Notes, Gen. 48:22. Josh. 24:29—32, v. 32.) But it is rather a paraphrase, than a translation; and not a fair paraphrase of the present text.—'O, we must say, with the great Bochart, that some unskilful grammarian, thinking that a nominative case was wanting before the word ωνησατο, was bought, wrote in the margin the word Αβρααμ, Abraham, which others put in the text, without which the words run thus, with exact truth. "So Jacob went down into Egypt, and died" (there), "he and our father; and they" (our fathers) "were carried over into Sychem, and laid in the sepulchre, that was bought for a sum of money of the sons of Emmor, the father of Sychem."' Whitby.

V. 17—29. (Marg. Ref. p, q, s. Notes, Gen. 15:12—15. Ex. 1:1—22.) The words here rendered, "exceeding fair," are literally, "fair to God," (Marg.) which some have rendered, "Beloved by God;" but this is not a just translation. Neither is there any ground to conclude, either that Moses prophesied, as some have supposed, or indeed had true faith and grace, till a short time before he visited his brethren. (Marg. Ref. b, c. Note, Heb. 11:24—26.) The clause, "fair to God," seems to refer to the Lord's purposes concerning Moses, which induced him to preserve him, when other children were destroyed; and by means of his extraordinary beauty to accomplish this. (Marg. Ref. u. Notes, Ex. 2:2—10. Heb. 11:23.)—Moses might be "mighty in words," as capable of calm, forcible, and conclusive reasoning; and yet be slow of speech, and destitute of the graces of elocution, as he modestly pleaded concerning himself. (Notes, Ex. 4:10—12.)—He had received some general intimation, that he should deliver his people; (as David was assured that he should reign over Israel;) but it does not appear, that he was expressly commissioned to attempt their deliverance at this time. From some general computation, it is probable that he supposed the appointed time was at hand; but forty years more must elapse, before that event actually took place. He also concluded, that when so distinguished a person, as he had been in Pharaoh's court, renounced all his prospects, to join interests with his enslaved people, as the deliverer whom God had raised up; they too, remembering the prediction and promise to Abraham, would readily attach themselves to him: but in this he found himself mistaken. (Marg. Ref. x—l. Notes, Ex. 2:11—15. Heb. 11:24—27.)—'The speech of this single person is represented, (35) as expressing the sentiments of the whole body of the people: as their slowness afterwards to believe the mission of Moses, when attested by miracles, seems evidently to show that it was.' Doddridge. (Note, Luke 12:13,14.)—Stranger. (29) *Marg. LORD came to him, saying." (31,35. Notes, Gen. 48:16. Ex. 3:2—6.) Some make the expression, that "God sent Moses, by the hand of the angel," an objection to the conclusion that this was not a created angel, but the "Angel JEHOVAH," the Angel or Messenger of the covenant, the Word and Son of God, by whom he has always been declared unto men. (Notes, Mal. 3:1—4, v. 1. John 1:18.) But it only implies the distinct personality of the Father and the Son; and that the Son, having undertaken to become incarnate, always was the medium of communication between the invisible God and sinful man: and though he often appeared in human form, yet was he "the God of Abraham, and of Isaac, and of Jacob;" being One with and equal to the Father. (Marg. Ref. p—t. Notes, Matt. 22:23—33, v. 32. Phil. 2:5—11.) Moses was ordered to put off his shoes, and the priests under the law are supposed to have ministered barefoot in the sanctuary: as no shoes or sandals are mentioned, though particular orders are given about all the other garments. This was an expression of reverence, and an emblem of circumspection. (Notes, Ex. 3:4,5. Josh. 5:13—15.)—The example of the Israelites, refusing the help of Moses, was suited to show the Jews, that it was no new thing for their nation to reject those whom God had sent to rule over and deliver them: and therefore it was the less wonderful, that they had rejected and crucified their promised Messiah.—(Marg. Ref. y—g.) "It would be too frigid an interpretation to say that the Lord called Moses by the ministration of an angel; when, (unless I am deceived,) this also is signified, that Moses was armed by his hand and power, seeing that Angel, namely Christ, (as the apostle explains it, 1 Cor. 10:9.) was the true Deliverer and Leader, whose servant Moses was.' Beza.—I have seen, &c. V. 37—43. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. h—o. Notes, 3:22—26. Deut. 18:15—22.) Moses had predicted, that God would raise up a Prophet like to him in Israel, to whom the people were commanded to hearken, even in preference to him; and it might be expected, that this Prophet would change some at least of the externals appointed by him. (Notes, 6:9—14. Matt. 17:5—8.) The Jews whom Stephen addressed, professed a strong attachment to Moses; yet their fathers, even after he had brought them out of Egypt, and when they were daily witnessing the most stupendous miracles which God wrought by him, were by no means submissive to him. For even "this Moses," for whom they were about to reject the Messiah, when in the church, or congregation, of Israel in the wilderness, attended by the manifested presence of the great "Angel of the covenant," even JEHOVAH, who spake to him from Sinai, and from whom he received those lively oracles, or revelations of the divine will, which contained the way of salvation and eternal life, could not secure their obedience to his authority: on the contrary, they thrust him from them, desired to return to Egyptian bondage, and seduced Aaron to make the golden calf, in contempt of Moses and of the LORD. (Marg. Ref. p—u. Notes, Ex. 32:—34: Neh. 9:15—17, v. 17.) This had been an earnest and specimen of their subsequent idolatries in after ages, to which God judicially gave them up, till at length he sentenced the nation to captivity under the Assyrians and Chaldeans. (Marg. Ref. x—e. Note, Am. 5:25—27.)—The name Remphan is here substituted for Chiun in Amos; but little satisfactory has been advanced concerning the demon, or planet, worshipped under this name.—Some conclude from the clause, "took up the tabernacle of Moloch," that shrines of Moloch, or models of the idol-temple and image within it, were publicly carried in procession by the worshippers. (Note, 19:23—31.) This however Moses would not allow so long as he lived. They therefore suppose, that God, as a punishment of the idolatry of Israel, in worshipping him under the image of the golden calf, at length gave up the nation to still more open and atrocious idolatry; till they had filled up the measure of their crimes, and were sent into captivity, into Chaldea, Media, and still more distant regions. Many intimations, however, are given by the prophets, that gross idolatries were secretly practised, even in the wilderness. (Notes, Ez. 20:10—17.)—Stephen observed that this had been the conduct of their ancestors in all former ages, and the Jews had no cause to glory in them: God had before given up the nation to idolatry and captivity; and they had no reason to confide in present external privileges, but rather to fear the terrible judgments of God for crucifying the Messiah. And, as the prophets had formerly predicted the Assyrian and Babylonish captivity, which had come to pass accordingly; so they had no cause to condemn him for predicting the approaching ruin of their city, temple, and nation, if they persisted to oppose the religion of Jesus.—Lively oracles. (38) The law, as given by Moses, considered in itself, was "the ministration of death;" but as connected with the types, prophecies, and instituted ordinances, which contained the substance of the gospel, under that dispensation, the way of life eternal was pointed out, and known in a measure by all true believers: and in this sense, even the books of Moses were "living oracles," a revelation by which numbers obtained eternal life, through faith in him of whom Moses in the law, as well as all the subsequent prophets, bore witness.—Make us gods. (40) Exactly from the LXX, Ex. 32:1. (Notes, Ex. 32:1,7—10.)—Ye took up, &c. (42,43) The LXX have Raiphan and Damascus, instead of Remphan and Babylon, Am. 5:26,27. (Note, Am. 5:25—27.)—Some copies here read Damascus.

fathers, under the leading of Jesus, or Joshua, (the type of Jesus the Messiah;) and, as it witnessed the gracious presence of God with them, and their relation to him, being typical of good things to come, which appeared by the injunction given to Moses about forming it; (Note, Ex. 25:40.) so it answered the same purposes, for several hundred years after their settlement in Canaan. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. f—l.) And though David, having been highly favoured and prospered, desired greatly to build a temple; (Notes, 2 Sam. 7:1—16. Ps. 132:1—6.) he was only allowed to make preparation for it; because he had been a warrior, and had shed blood: and therefore the building of the temple was reserved for Solomon, his peaceable Son, who was an eminent type of the Messiah. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Notes, 1 Chr. 22:1—12. 29:1—19.) Yet when Solomon had finished his magnificent edifice, he considered it merely as a symbol of the Lord's merciful presence with his true worshippers, and not as a real habitation for the Deity; as if JEHOVAH must needs continue his regard to it and the people, however they behaved: and the language of their prophets, as well as the Babylonish captivity, should have taught the Jews to expect, that the temple would be destroyed, whenever their presumption and rebellion provoked God to turn against them, and be their enemy. (Notes, 1 Kings 8:27. 9:3—9. Is. 66:1,2. Jer. 7:1—15.) The chosen race, Abraham and his seed, had served God above four hundred years, before the law of Moses was promulgated, or the tabernacle erected; and Solomon's temple was not built till four hundred and eighty years afterwards. So that nearly half the time, from the calling of Abraham till the coming of the Messiah, the true worshippers had served God, without the temple: and could those things be essential to true religion, which had not existed during so many ages? —The tabernacle of witness. (44) Thus the LXX translate the Hebrew words, which may signify "the tabernacle of meeting;" namely, the place where the congregation assembled, where they hoped to meet God with acceptance, and where he had appointed to meet them.—Heaven, &c. (49,50) The quotation is not made exactly from the LXX; (Is. 66: 1,2.) and it varies both from that and the Hebrew, by putting the last clause as a question: "Hath not?" 'As Stephen had been accused of blaspheming the temple; he, with great propriety, takes occasion to speak of their sacred places with due reverence, as raised by special direction from God; and yet corrects that extravagant regard to them, and confidence in them, which the Jews were ready to entertain.' Doddridge.

V. 51—53. It is conjectured with great probability, that the council, perceiving the scope of Stephen's discourse, and the conclusions which he was about to draw from it in favour of the gospel, as condemning their conduct, and justifying his own doctrine, grew so tumultuous, and showed such indications of anger and impatience, that he found he should not be allowed to bring his argument to a regular conclusion. He was therefore emboldened and influenced by the Holy Spirit, to apply it in few words, but in the terms of most severe reproof, to the consciences of his furious and malignant judges. He addressed them as an obstinate untractable people, who rested in the outward sign of circumcision, while their hearts were closed by pride, enmity, and unbelief against the truth of God. (Marg. Ref. x, y. Notes, Lev. 26: 41,42. Deut. 10:16. 30:1—10, v. 6. Jer. 4:3,4. 9:25,26. Rom. 2: 25—29.) Indeed, to resist the Holy Spirit, by rejecting the testimony of inspired prophets, and fighting against them, and him that spake by them, and by sinning in defiance of convictions, had always characterized the nation. (Marg. Ref. z, a. Notes, Is. 63:10. Heb. 10:28—31.) Thus their fathers had done in every age: they had opposed and persecuted the prophets, almost without exception, from Moses to Jeremiah, who foretold the captivity; and Ezekiel, and those that arose afterwards; who all, in one way or other, foretold the coming of that righteous Saviour and King, whom they had now traitorously delivered up to Pilate, and thus most basely murdered. (Marg. Ref. b—e. Notes, Matt. 23:34 —39. Luke 11:46—54.) They had indeed received the law, as given to Moses on Mount Sinai, by JEHOVAH, amidst ranks of attendant and worshipping angels: and they were proud of that distinction. (Marg. Ref. f. g. Notes, Gal. 3:19 —22. Heb. 2:1—4.) But they had never applied their minds to understand, observe, or obey it, in its spiritual meaning, and with reference to "Christ, the end of the law for righteousness to every believer." (Note, Rom. 10:1—4.)—The supposition before mentioned is the more probable, as Stephen began his defence in the most calm and respectful language, and touched on such topics as were suited to conciliate and gain the attention of the audience: but nothing can well exceed the marked severity of his conclusion. Had it not been expressly stated that he was "full of the Holy Ghost," when he spake it, many would have been ready to censure him: but probably he was sensible that the council were determined on his death, out of desperate enmity to his Lord; and he was moved to bear this awful testimony against them, and thus to warn them against that destruction which they were about to bring upon themselves, without further respect to their rank, or fear of their vengeance; but not without tender compassion for their souls, as his dying prayer evinced. 'Stephen, fired with a divine zeal, at length judges those who sat in judgment on him.' Beza.—The crucifixion of Christ was the most flagrant violation of the sixth commandment, which ever was committed: and if David, having shed blood in war, or even having shed the blood of Uriah, must not build the temple; could it be supposed that the temple would be continued to those who had shed the blood of the prophets, and filled up the measure of their crimes by "crucifying the Lord of glory?"

V. 54—60. (Note, 5:33—39.) The conclusion of Stephen's address enraged the malignant rulers even to madness; and they seemed like beasts of prey, who were about to devour him: they not only were cut in their hearts, as with a saw, but they gnashed their teeth with fury and anguish. (Marg. Ref. h, i. Note, Matt. 8:10—12.) Stephen, however, was not in the least intimidated by their fury: for, looking up to heaven, as appealing to God, and being filled with the Holy Spirit, he was favoured with an extraordinary vision, as the ancient prophets had been (Notes, Is. 6:1—4. Jer. 31:23 —26. Ez. 1:1—3. 8:1—4. 11:22—25. 2 Cor. 12:1—6. Rev. 1:9—11.) signify his readiness to plead the cause, and receive the soul, of his suffering disciple. Immediately Stephen proclaimed aloud before his enraged enemies, what a glorious scene was now opened to his view: but they, treating it as blasphemy, or determined to hear nothing further, stopped their ears, furiously ran upon him, hurried him out of the city, and stoned him to death. (Marg. Ref. k—t. Note, Matt. 26:63—68.) The witnesses, who had accused him of blasphemous words, being required to begin the execution, laid down their clothes at the feet of Saul. (Note, Deut. 17:2—7.) As he was a native of Cilicia, (6:9. 22:3.) he had probably heard, or even taken part in, the preceding disputation with Stephen; and thus, the first time we read of this most eminent apostle, we find him consenting and accessary to the death of the first martyr for the faith of Christ!—(Marg. Ref. u, x. Notes, 8:1. 22:17—21.)—At length Stephen invoked his incarnate Lord, and committed his departing soul into his hands, in nearly the same words which Jesus had used in addressing the Father, when he expired on the cross. (Luke 23:46. Note, Ps. 31:5.) He also calmly kneeled down; and amidst the agonies of this violent death, he copied his Lord's example when he prayed for his crucifiers; beseeching him, not to charge the guilt of this atrocious murder to those who perpetrated it; not to place it to their account; not to impute it to them, but to forgive it: (Marg. Ref. y—b. Notes, Ps. 32:1,2. Rom. 4:6—8. Luke 23:32—38, v. 34.) and having spoken these words he expired, with the composure of one who falls asleep. (Marg. Ref. c. Note, 1 Thes. 4:13—18.)—The early loss of so eminent a minister of Christ, in this manner, must indeed have been a heavy affliction to the church: but how animated was his end! how suited to confirm the faith of the disciples! What an example also were his boldness and his tenderness, even for his murderers! The instruction and encouragement of this single scene might produce the most beneficial effects on multitudes, and that permanently; even far greater than the long continued labours of many eminent ministers. Such in general has been the event of bloody persecution; and 'the noble army of martyrs' have done more, perhaps, towards the success of the gospel, by their sharp but transient sufferings, than the whole company of those who have professed and preached the truth, in quiet times; and without being called forth thus to show, in the fiery trial, the energy of their principles, and the power of divine grace, to the confusion of their enemies, and the encouragement of their brethren.—The prayer of Stephen was a most direct act of divine worship rendered to Jesus, appearing in human nature, as the Son of man, and attended by a vision of the glory of God. The word GOD does not occur in the original. To receive a departing soul to glory, and to pardon the guilt of most aggravated murder, are acts of divine power and authority; and it would be evidently most unreasonable, as well as unscriptural, to make such requests to any mere creature, whether present or absent. (Note, Matt. 9:2—8.) Indeed the Socinians are most grievously perplexed by this undeniable fact: after many other attempts to evade our inference from it, in which they have been evidently baffled in the argument; some very learned men have lately ventured to say, 'that the example of a man, in an ecstasy of devotion, and in the agonies of death, is not proper to be imitated by the whole church of God.' As if modern reasoners could better direct our faith and practice, than this apostolical Protomartyr, when "full of the Holy Ghost," when immediately favoured "with the visions of God," and when replete with the very light, joy, and temper of heaven itself!—And let it here be observed, that we bring a very large number of positive evidences to support the truth of this doctrine. If then objectors make very feeble efforts to invalidate the testimony of each of them, considered as detached from the rest, so that each still evinces the point in question; how very powerful must be the combined proof of the whole! For if twenty, or forty, or more, such texts were expunged out of the Bible, we should not want sufficient, yea, unanswerable evidence of the Deity of Christ.—It is here also inquired, By what authority did the Jewish council put Stephen to death? In the case of Jesus, they allowed, that they had no such authority: and it is probable that their situation was still the same. (Note, John 18:28—32.) Had they proceeded to pass a legal sentence on Stephen, they would perhaps have obtained permission from Pilate to execute it: but they stoned him in a popular fury, without any regular sentence; and the governor might choose to connive at it, as he did at some of their subsequent persecutions. (Notes, 8:1—4. 9:1,2.) 'The Jews were more than once ready to stone Christ, not only when by their own confession they had not power to put any one to death; but when nothing had passed which had the shadow of a legal trial. (John 8:59. 10:31. 18:31.)' Doddridge.—When the Jews would afterwards have put Paul to death, the chief captain and the governor hindered them: yet, if he had been killed, it is not unlikely that the irregularity would have been connived at, had it not been discovered that he was a Roman citizen. The sceptre, however, was gradually departing from Judah; and the Romans continually intrenched, more and more, upon the authority of the high-priest and council, till the whole was subverted; for Shiloh was come, and now the gathering of the people was to Him. (Note, Gen. 49:10.)—'If the spirit of a man died with his body, no reason can be given, why St. Stephen should pray to the Lord Jesus to "receive his spirit," rather than his body.' Whitby. (Notes, John 14:2,3. 2 Cor. 5:5—8. Phil. 1:21—26.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. We should be ready to "give a reason of the hope that is in us," to inquiries of every description: this ought indeed to be done in meekness, and with cautious fear of disgracing a cause which should be dearer to us than our lives; but we may confidently rely on the Lord to "give us in the same hour what we should speak," if called to answer for ourselves before the enemies of his truth. (Notes, Matt. 10:19,20. 1 Pet. 3:13—16.)—Whatever bold and faithful application we may intend or be led to make, of the doctrines which we inculcate, we should always speak with evident benevolence: and it is proper to render civil respect and honour even to those superiors, against whose usurped or abused authority we are constrained to protest.—In all addresses to those who allow the truth of the Scriptures, we should call their attention to them, lodge our appeal with them, and thence deduce our arguments.—It is very lawful and expedient to express approbation of men's opinions, as far as consistent with truth, and even to avoid the mention of their more harmless prejudices; in order that we may reason with them from their own principles, and so oppose their erroneous conclusions and evil practices.—It is also profitable to recur to the first rise of those usages or sentiments, which have been warped or perverted.—Would we know the nature and effects of justifying faith, we should study the character of "the father of the faithful." "The God of glory," to whom he had been a stranger, called him to leave his country and friends: he 'through grace obeyed the calling;' and from that time he walked with God, as his friend and worshipper. This may teach us the efficacy and freeness of divine grace, the nature of conversion, and the way to follow the Lord in faith and hope, and to wait for the fulfilment of his promises in humble patience. Here too we may see, that external forms and distinctions (though idolized by numbers) are of small value, compared with dependence, submission, obedience, separation from the world and devotedness to God.—The promised seed are sojourners in a strange land; their inheritance is in reversion, and must be waited for; they will be evil entreated in this world, and they should leave it to God to judge their oppressors. Our deliverance from the bondage of sin and Satan, is an introduction to our serving the Lord according to his word: and, though the external seals are not always posterior, in time, to the grace of the covenant, they are in all cases of immensely inferior importance, and only valuable as in one way or other subservient to it: yet exact obedience in these and all other things is our bounden duty.

V. 9—29. Those whom God most favours will often be envied and injured, even by those who are of reputation in the visible church. But though the troubles of the righteous man seem grievous and tedious, "the Lord delivereth him out of them all:" and wisdom, favour, and preferment, are given by God alone. He often renders the most despised persons the instruments of saving those who contemned them; even as the insulted and crucified Jesus was "exalted to be a Prince and Saviour, to give repentance and forgiveness to Israel."—All the promises of God will be accomplished in due season, and nothing can retard or hasten that appointed time. Every earthly friend may fail, or requite our services with black ingratitude; but the Lord will not forsake his people.—In the darkest times of persecution, when treachery and cruelty have combined to destroy the church, the most eminent instruments of its deliverance have been raised up: and

CHAPTER VIII.

Saul well approves the murder of Stephen; and the disciples, "except the apostles," are dispersed by persecution, 1. Devout men bury Stephen, and lament over him, 2. Saul makes havoc of the church, 3, 4. Philip preaches in Samaria, and has great success, 5—8. Simon, who had long bewitched the people by sorceries, believes and is baptized, 9—13. Peter and John, being sent thither, by prayer and imposition of hands confer the gift of the Holy Ghost, 14—17. Simon, offering money for the like power, is by Peter rebuked, warned, and called to repent, 18—24. The apostles, having preached in the cities of Samaria, return to Jerusalem, 25. Philip is sent by an angel into the desert of Gaza, 26; where he meets with a eunuch, treasurer of Candace queen of Ethiopia, returning in his chariot from Jerusalem, and reading the prophecy of Isaiah, 27, 28. By a divine monition he joins the chariot, and preaches Jesus to the Ethiopian, 29—35; who, professing faith in him as "the Son of God," is baptized, 36—38. The Spirit conveys away Philip, who preaches in the cities on the sea-coast, till he comes to Cesarea: and the eunuch returns home rejoicing, 39, 40.

when peculiar services are to be performed, God furnishes his servants with suitable qualifications, and sometimes by means of those aliens against whom they are destined to be employed.—Very useful persons have lived for many years among the enemies of God, and have possessed authority, wealth, or reputation in the world: but when he "puts it into their hearts" to join themselves to him and his people; they readily renounce these advantages, and endure reproach, hardship, and affliction, for his sake.—Difficulties and perils await the believer, not only from open enemies, but from false or heartless brethren: and they, by whose hands the most extraordinary services have been performed, have found often, during many years, that the people did not understand the Lord's intentions respecting them.—Those who are doing wrong are generally most impatient of rebuke: and Jesus himself is rejected as a Ruler and a Judge, because his commands and decisions run counter to men's lusts and iniquities.—He who labours to persuade the professed people of God, to cease from their disgraceful and pernicious contests with each other, is generally exposed to reproach from those, who especially are most evidently criminal, as if he wanted to usurp authority not belonging to him.—But though men thus prolong their own miseries, the Lord will take care of his servants, and compass his own designs of mercy; and years of retired contemplation, devotion, and humble industry, are as useful to his servants, as those spent in a learned education, or in the active scenes of life: while a humble willingness to labour in obscurity, after having shone in more public stations, is a happy indication of heavenly wisdom and genuine magnanimity. (Note, Ex. 2:21. P. O. 11—25. Note, 3:11.)

V. 30—43. The best of men have cause to stand in awe, and even to tremble, in the presence of God; though in infinite condescension, he is pleased to dwell in his church, as in a burning bush; to put honour on it, notwithstanding its meanness; and to preserve it amidst its fiery trials. (Note, Ex. 3:2. P. O. 1—6.) He sees the affliction, and hears the groaning of his people under distresses, oppressions, and persecutions; yea, he often sends his ministers to rescue sinners, when they are disposed to reject them.—If we would have Jesus for a Deliverer, we must submit to him as a Ruler, and wait for him as a Judge; else we shall perish with the Egyptians, and not be saved with the Israelites. He is the great "Angel of the covenant," who brings his people from bondage, through the wilderness to their promised rest; and all the scenes exhibited in Egypt, at the Red Sea, at Sinai, and in Canaan, shadowed forth his excellences, and his glorious salvation. But as Israel thrust Moses from them, and purposed to return to their bondage; so men in general will not obey Jesus, because they love this present evil world: and any kind of false religion or irreligion, however absurd, by which men rejoice in their own works and imaginations, is more suitable to the carnal mind, than the spiritual truth and worship set before us in the sacred Scriptures. (Notes, Ex. 32:1—6. P. O. 1—14.) On this account, God is provoked to give men up to their lusts and delusions, and so they fill up their measure of sin, and perish without remedy.

V. 44—60. Every review of the history of the world, of the church, or of our own hearts and lives, tends to "exclude boasting," and to cover us with shame: and the whole Scripture proclaims man to be a proud ungrateful rebel against God. He works by various means and instruments, and men are almost universally guilty of neglecting or of idolizing them. But as heaven is his throne, and the earth his "footstool," none our services can profit him who "made all these things:" and next to the human Nature of Christ, the broken and spiritual heart is his most valued temple. (Note, Is. 57:15,16.) —The plainest arguments, and the most incontestable facts, only irritate those whose interests and passions have engaged them against the truth: and it is proper that they should be shown, in the most explicit manner, their guilt and danger, who with determined obstinacy "resist the Holy Spirit;" who are 'baptized infidels;' who tread in the steps of those that betrayed and murdered the just and gracious Saviour; and who habitually violate those very precepts which they substitute in the place of his righteousness and atonement.—The application is generally the most useful, and often the most offensive part of a discourse; without which the rest will make but a transient impression: but when sinners are convicted, and not humbled, they will be exasperated; and the greatest wisdom and grace cannot mollify them.—Though we are not favoured with prophetic visions, we may by faith steadfastly fix our thoughts and affections on heavenly things: thus we shall see the glory of God, and Jesus ever appearing in the Father's presence for us, enthroned in power pleading our cause, and prepared to help us in all our distresses, and at last to receive our departing souls. We must not then refuse to confess his name, to declare his glory, and to avow our obligations to him, even in the presence of his most furious enemies. If we be called to suffer for his sake, we should the more earnestly call on his name, to support us under our trials, and to bring us to his glory; never forgetting to beseech him to forgive and bless our enemies and persecutors. Thus may we follow those, "who through faith and patience now inherit the promises;" that while we live, we may glorify Him; and whenever we die, we may fall asleep in the arms of his power, truth, and love; to be received into "his presence, where is fulness of joy," and to share "the pleasures that are at his right hand for evermore."

NOTES.—CHAP. VIII. V. 1. The word "consenting," is much too feeble: the original implies complacency, and cordial approbation. (Note, 22:17—21.)—As the rulers had compassed the death of Stephen, without exciting an insurrection of the people, or the resentment of the governor, they ventured to carry on the persecution with increasing violence. —The whole subsequent history shows that a great number of believers continued at Jerusalem: though it is probable, that the most of those who commonly resided in other countries, returned home at that time: and many others doubtless fled from the storm. But the preachers of the gospel were particularly aimed at, and were especially scattered. The apostles, however, though principally obnoxious, stood their ground: they were satisfied that their presence was still necessary at Jerusalem: and their enemies were so restrained or overawed, that they did not venture to assault them—though, no doubt, they zealously and diligently laboured to promote the gospel. (Marg. Ref. a, f. Notes, Neh. 6:10—14. 1 Cor. 16:5—9, v. 9.)—'It is a very ancient tradition . . . that our Lord assigned twelve years after his ascension, for the conversion of the unbelieving Jews in Judea, . . . saying to his apostles, Go ye out into the world after twelve years. . . . It shows the reason, why the apostles continued at Jerusalem, while the rest of the disciples were scattered abroad.' Whitby. As the Scripture says nothing of this, it is far more probable, especially after the command before given, (5:20.) that the apostles, considering the importance of their station at this crisis, and the necessity of showing both friends and enemies, that they were not to be intimidated; and, depending on special protection, acted as Daniel did on a similar occasion, and left the event to God. (Notes, Dan. 6:)—As the disciples had before lived in much harmony and comfort together; they would not perhaps have thought of separating so soon, if this storm had not arisen: thus the efforts of Satan and his servants were overruled for the promulgation of the gospel; while the apostles were competent for all the work which was to be done in Jerusalem, and the persecution would not prevent, but forward their success.

V. 2. Even in the prospect of this rising storm, some of the devoted servants of Christ ventured to give an honourable interment to the mangled body of Stephen; and to lament their own loss, and that of the church, in the premature removal of so able and faithful a minister, from whose continued labours so great things might have been expected. (Note, Is. 57:1,2.) Thus honourably and publicly to bury one stoned by the council, as a blasphemer, and as such accursed, was a very courageous display of faith, zeal, and confidence in God. It must also have greatly offended the persecutors, and perhaps served as a pretence for their subsequent violence (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. Saul, having distinguished himself at Stephen's martyrdom, was judged a suitable agent in the service of the persecutors; and he furiously engaged in it, like a savage tiger or wolf, making havoc among the defenceless sheep!—The circumstance of Saul's entering every house of the disciples, and dragging away, not only men, but women also, and casting them into prison, should be carefully noted. He "was exceedingly mad against them."—Doubtless many were cut off at this time: yet Pilate seems to have connived at it. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 7:54—60. 9:1,2. 26:9—11.)

V. 4. Marg. Ref.—They that were scattered, &c.] 'Not the whole church of Jerusalem, or the body of the laity; ... for what authority had they to preach the word? but the hundred and eight that were "full of the Holy Ghost."' Whitby.—The whole company, after our Lord's ascension, was about one hundred and twenty, that is, one hundred and eight besides the twelve apostles: but it clearly appears from the history, that the women formed a part of this number. After so great an increase of the church as had since that time taken place, it may well be supposed, that many had been set apart for the ministry before the martyrdom of Stephen. So that, even allowing that none were scattered, except the ministers; (which is extremely improbable;) it is incongruous to limit the number in this manner.—'There is no room to inquire where these poor refugees had their orders. They were endued with miraculous gifts; and if they had not been so, the extraordinary call they had to spread the knowledge of Christ, wherever they came, among those who were ignorant of him, would abundantly justify them in what they did.' Doddridge.—Were then all the Christians endued with miraculous powers? or might none, who were not, declare what they had seen and heard?—'Some difference may perhaps be here observed between ευαγγελιζεσθαι, ... and κηρυσσειν' ... not in respect of the matter of their preaching, but of the manner of it. The latter ... doth generally signify a public solemn proclaiming of Christ, as when a ... herald or crier doth ... by way of office proclaim any thing: but the former imports no more than the telling it, making it known; as good news is published, without the voice of a herald or crier, by all that have heard it, to all they meet with. ... Not that ευαγγελιζεσθαι is never used of that public, authoritative proclaiming; for it is sometimes used of the apostles: and the word ... Evangelist is the name of an office in the apostles' times. ... But, I say, that sometimes, and particularly in this place, it may belong to whatsoever publishing the gospel of Christ; and by whomsoever, that is, by those who have no calling to it. For when the doctrine of Christ was first preached by the apostles, ... and a multitude of ... Jews and proselytes received the faith, and for doing so professedly, were presently persecuted and driven out of Jerusalem; it is not to be imagined, but that all, wheresoever they came, both men and women, published what they knew, both of the doctrine, and the miracles by which it was confirmed, and of their own sufferings for it. ... When of Philip, who was a deacon ... it is related, ... that "he preached Christ," it follows that he baptized also.—But of these other disciples, there is no more said, but that they passed along ... publishing this good news, the gospel which they had received; but no mention of gathering disciples, or baptizing. Accordingly ... when there is mention ... of these very men, that being scattered by the persecution, ... they spake the word, or published the gospel, ... the phrase used is observable: (11:19. Gr.) the word λαλειν being known to belong to any way of reporting or relating, by talk or discourse. ... And upon the success of this, through God's prospering hand, and many receiving the faith, it follows, that ... the church of Jerusalem ... sent Barnabas to visit and confirm them. ... Thus Apollos (18:25) spake and taught exactly the things concerning the Lord, knowing only the baptism of John.' Hammond.—It appears to me, that the remarks contained in this quotation, are suited to throw much light on a difficult and disputed subject. Whether the learned author's criticism on the original words be exact, or not; the difference between statedly and authoritatively, as a herald, and by office and authority, preaching to regularly convened congregations; and simply declaring what a man knows of Christ and salvation, among relations, juniors, ignorant neighbours, or ignorant persons of any sort, without assuming any authority, seems of great importance. No doubt, in this way a man's sphere will often gradually enlarge, till he appears something like an authoritative preacher: but would it not then be proper, that pastors and rulers should send some Barnabas, to confirm what has been done, and to confer the due authority? and would it not be right, in this case, for the person himself to seek from the pastors and teachers of the church, their regular sanction to his labours, now become more public, than he at first either expected or intended?—To authorize all who choose, without any human appointment, and in ordinary cases, to become authoritative preachers, seems a dangerous extreme: and to suppose that no man, in an ignorant family or among poor children, or illiterate neglected persons, may expound a chapter of sacred Scripture, or talk to them about their souls, except previously ordained to the ministry; appears suited to destroy all zeal in the laity for the success of the gospel, and to prevent all communication of knowledge to a deluded and perishing world; except by those, who are so fully employed in their own several charges, as to have little opportunity of attempting any thing further; and who are often restricted, by peculiar circumstances, from every exertion out of their own line and department. V. 5—8. It is evident that Philip the apostle was not here meant, for he continued at Jerusalem; and the mission of Peter and John to Samaria evinces the same: (Note, 14—17.) and as Philip, one of the seven, was the only person of that name, whom the historian had mentioned, he was doubtless here spoken of. (Marg. Ref. l. Note, 6:2—6, v. 5.)—As Jesus had stayed two days among the Samaritans, and had mentioned them among those to whom the apostles were to preach; (Notes, 1:4—8. John 4:39—42.) the apostles do not seem to have hesitated about the admission of the Samaritans into the church, notwithstanding the bigoted enmity of the Jews against them. Probably, Philip went to the same city (Sychar) where Christ had preached: and, though the impressions made by his word might, in many instances, have been effaced: yet when Philip preached Jesus to them, as the promised Messiah, and wrought many signal miracles in proof of his resurrection from the dead; they with one consent attended on his ministry, and expressed great joy throughout the city, that this blessed "gospel of salvation" had been sent to them, and that they were invited and admitted to share the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom. V. 9—13. It is evident that Simon actually used sorcery, and produced many extraordinary effects by satanical influence, and not merely by human imposture: (Marg. Ref. t. Notes, Ex. 7:11,12,22,23. 22:18.) and, while he boasted "that he was some great one," (Note, 2 Pet. 2:18,19.) the Samaritans were so exceedingly astonished at his sorceries, that they were even fascinated into a belief, that he was a man by whom the great power of God was most signally displayed and exerted: perhaps he avowed himself, or was supposed to be the promised Messiah. (Marg. Ref. u—a. Notes, Is. 53:1. 1 Cor. 1:20—24. Gal. 3:1—5, v. 1.) Ecclesiastical historians have given us strange accounts of the horrid blasphemies which this man propagated; but these seem to have been subsequent to the events here recorded.—The evident and beneficent miracles of Philip, however, confirming his doctrine concerning the kingdom of God, and the salvation of Jesus Christ, being attended by a peculiar blessing, effectually rescued many of the people from the infatuation, and prevailed on them to profess faith in Christ, by being baptized: and, as in Christ, there is no distinction of male or female, both men and women were thus received into the church. (Marg. Ref. b—d. Note, Gal. 3:26—29, v. 28.) Perhaps Philip exposed the nature and tendency of Simon's magical arts. At length, however, that sorcerer professed himself a believer, and probably had a strong conviction in his mind and conscience of the truth of the gospel: accordingly he too was baptized, and continued to attend on Philip with great assiduity; being as much astonished by beholding Philip's miracles, as the Samaritans had been by his sorceries.—Perhaps Simon deemed Philip a magician of superior skill and attainments, and hoped to get acquainted with the secret of his art, by which he produced effects, far exceeding all that he himself had been able to perform. (Marg. and *Marg. V. 14—17. The apostles acted in concert, as a collective body; no one arrogating authority over the others, but every one paying a great regard to the determination of the whole company. Peter, therefore, who was in every thing the most forward to speak and to act, and John the beloved disciple, were "sent" by their brethren to confirm the converted Samaritans in the faith.—When they came to the city, and saw the effects of Philip's ministry; they, by prayer and imposition of hands, obtained for the converts the Holy Spirit; that is, his miraculous gifts and operations. For though, as believers, they partook of his regenerating, sanctifying, and comforting influences; yet they had not before been favoured with these extraordinary communications. 'Without doubt, Peter and John were sent by the other apostles, partly that they might confirm the doctrine of Philip the deacon; and partly that they might establish a church in that city by apostolical authority.' Beza. (Marg. Ref. g—m.)—Some expositors maintain, that none received the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, except such as were marked out by God himself, to be pastors and teachers: and others seem to think, that the whole company of Christians partook of them. This, however, is unlikely; (1 Cor. 12.29,30.) yet it is plain, that others, besides the ministers, were thus favoured. It is probable, that many received the gift of the Holy Spirit, by the laying on of the apostles' hands, and that from among these persons the ministers were generally selected, by those who were intrusted with that important concern. (Notes, 13:1—3. 14:21—23. 19:1—7. 2 Tim. 2:1,2. Tit. 1:5—9.)—It may be supposed, that Peter and John ordained ministers in this city of the Samaritans. But it does not appear, that their laying of hands on some "that they might receive the Holy Spirit," after having prayed for the company in general that they might partake of these benefits, implied previous ordination.—The right of confirmation, as practised by many Christian churches, has often been, and still is, spoken of as a continuation of this apostolical imposition of hands, for the confirmation of new converts, by the Holy Spirit thus given to them. But it is far from evident, that this was done universally by the apostles, or by those who immediately succeeded them. As, however, miraculous powers, rather than sanctifying grace, were thus conferred; unless miraculous powers were now connected with that rite, the parallel must wholly fail. How far something of this kind, properly regulated and conducted, may be rendered subservient to the edification of young persons, descended from Christian parents, and baptized when infants, is another question: but to advance this observance into a sacrament, and even above a sacrament, (as it certainly is advanced, when the Holy Spirit is supposed to be conferred by imposition of hands, and by using words in prayer like those of Peter and John,) puts the subject in a very different light. Doubtless it was at first thus magnified, in order to exalt the episcopal order, to whom the administration of it was confined, as if they were intrusted with apostolical authority: but as miracles are out of the question; so to follow the apostles in faith, humility, diligence, in "preaching in season, out of season," in piety, and self-denial, is the only scriptural or adequate method of magnifying either the episcopal or the clerical office. Assuredly, as this matter is very often conducted, it must be allowed to be an evil; and it ought either to be attended to in another manner, or not at all.—It appears indisputable that Philip was, before these transactions, a regularly ordained minister, or evangelist. (Note, 6:2—6.)

V. 18—24. Many teachers, and probably private Christians, wrought miracles, and spake with tongues, "as the Spirit gave them utterance:" but the honour of communicating those gifts, by imposition of hands and prayer, was, generally at least, restricted to the apostles. When Simon, therefore, saw the effects which followed from the laying on of their hands; he concluded, that they could, if they chose, impart to him a similar power, supposing that the whole power was at their disposal. (Note, 2 Cor. 13:7—10.) This he supposed would admirably subserve his purpose of obtaining honour and wealth: for by enabling men at his own will to speak foreign languages, without the trouble of learning them; and to cure diseases by a word, he should not only carry on a most lucrative trade, but be almost adored as a deity. Judging therefore of the apostles by himself, and seeing that they were very poor men: he supposed that they would willingly confer this power on him for a sum of money, and he ventured to make this infamous proposal to them. (Marg. Ref. p, q.) His ambitious mind could not be satisfied with the power of working miracles himself; (though indeed this seems not to have been conferred on him;) but he aspired to the unrestricted power of communicating the Holy Spirit, for the same purposes, to whom he pleased. Instead of deeming the very lowest place, among the people of God, too great an honour for one whose sorcery, impiety, and blasphemy had been so atrocious; as he certainly would have done, if he had been truly converted: he aspired, with horrible pride and ambition, at equality with the apostles in power and authority; while he meant to prostitute the sacred operations of the Holy Spirit, to gratify his love of filthy lucre and of human applause, and attempted to seduce the apostles to concur in the detestable sacrilege!—Whatever miraculous power of discerning men's spirits Peter might possess, and on some occasions exercise, he had no need of it in this case: but, perceiving the extreme wickedness and hypocrisy of Simon, he expressed his abhorrence of his money and of his crime, in the most decided manner. Let him take his treasure with him, if he could, into that perdition, to which he was evidently hastening; for Peter would have none of it. This was not a wish that Simon might perish; but an awful warning that he was in most extreme danger of perdition, which he could not escape if he proceeded further in his present course. Peter added, that he made this proposal, because being utterly ignorant of God and spiritual things, and awfully blinded by Satan, he had blasphemously thought that the free and most precious gift of God's Spirit might be bought and sold by a mercenary traffic. (Marg. Ref. r—t.) He was, therefore, evidently destitute of true faith, and "had neither part or lot" in the blessings of the gospel; as "his heart was not right in the sight of God," nor was his profession of Christianity sincere. If he would then escape pe-

26 ¶ And [h]the Angel of the Lord spake unto Philip, saying, [i]Arise, and go toward the south, unto the way that goeth down from Jerusalem unto [k]Gaza, which is [l]desert.

27 And [m]he arose and went: and, behold, [n]a man of Ethiopia, an eunuch of great authority under Candace [o]queen of the Ethiopians, who had the charge of all her treasure, [p]and had come to Jerusalem for to worship, 28 Was returning, [q]and sitting in his chariot read [r]Esaias the prophet.

29 Then [s]the Spirit said unto Philip, Go near, and join thyself to this chariot.

30 And Philip [t]ran thither to him, and heard him read the prophet Esaias, and said, [u]Understandest thou what thou readest?

31 And he said, [x]How can I, except some man should guide me? [y]And he desired Philip that he would come up and sit with him.

32 The place of the Scripture which he read was this, [z]He was led [a]as a sheep to the slaughter; [b]and like a lamb dumb before his shearer, so [c]opened he not his mouth:

33 In [d]his humiliation his [e]judgment was taken away; [f]and who shall declare his generation? [g]for his life is taken from the earth.

34 And the eunuch answered Philip, and said, I pray thee, [h]of whom speaketh the prophet this? of himself, or of some other man?

35 Then Philip [i]opened his mouth, and [k]began at the same Scripture, and [l]preached unto him Jesus.

dition, let him deeply repent of this most horrid wickedness, and pray earnestly to God, that this blasphemous thought of his depraved heart might be pardoned. For though "all manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven" to the true penitent; yet Simon's crime came at least so near to that against the Holy Spirit, which never can be pardoned, that it was a very doubtful case, whether God would ever give him true repentance. (Marg. Ref. u—b. Notes, Matt. 12:31,32. 2 Tim. 2:23—26.)—Indeed he was, as it were, so plunged and drenched in impiety, as in the bitterest gall; that he must be most loathsome in the sight of God, and exposed to the most dreadful punishment; and he was, evidently, so bound in the chains of sin and Satan, that the almighty power of God alone could deliver him. (Marg. Ref. c, d.)—Nothing can be more evident, than that the apostle here exhorted an unconverted sinner to repentance and prayer; yea, one who he feared had committed the unpardonable sin, though he did not look upon his case as absolutely hopeless.—When Simon heard this awful warning, denunciation, and exhortation, he desired the apostles to "pray for him:" not that he might be delivered from his ambition, avarice, and impiety; but that he might be exempted from the punishments which they had mentioned. Perhaps he feared a doom similar to that of Ananias and Sapphira: or he hoped, that by inducing the apostles to conceal his crime, he might escape infamy, and have an opportunity of carrying on his delusions. For he does not seem to have professed any repentance, or to have prayed for himself. (Note, 1 Sam. 15:30,31.)—Credible historians inform us, that he retained a sort of profession of Christianity, which he distorted by the most horrible and senseless blasphemies; and thus he became the founder of a most multifarious sect of heretics, who were long the trial and the scandal of the church. (Marg. Ref. e.)—From his infamous attempt to bargain for the power conferring the Holy Spirit, all mercenary contracts for church-benefices, and other methods of turning the concerns of religion into a lucrative trade, are called Simony; of which there have been, and are, a great variety of species; and will be, so long as men continue covetous and ambitious, and verily suppose that "gain is godliness." It is therefore much easier to expose and declaim against such impious practices, than to find an effectual remedy for them.—Alas, Simon Magus has left far more indisputable successors than Simon Peter has done: especially in that church which grounds its claims on succeeding to St. Peter's authority: but not in that church alone.—(Notes, and P. O. Is. 56:9—12. *P. O. V. 25. The apostles having performed the service on which they had been sent; and having "testified, and preached the word of the Lord" in this city of Samaria, set out to return to Jerusalem, and in their journey they preached the gospel with success (for so the word implies) in many villages of the Samaritans. John was one of those who formerly asked leave to call for fire from heaven, to consume certain of that nation; but his Lord had now taught him better things. (Marg. Ref. Note, Luke 9:51—56.)

V. 26—31. Philip seems to have continued some time among the Samaritans, after the return of the apostles; at length an angel was sent to order him immediately to go to a part of the road, between Jerusalem and Gaza, which lay through a desert: and he obeyed without demurring; though it must have appeared strange to be sent a journey of many miles, into an uninhabited place, without being told what he was to do when he came thither. (Marg. Ref. h—m. Notes, John 2:1—11, vv. 5—8. Heb. 11:8—10. But just when he arrived at the spot, a chariot, passing on the road, began to show for what end he had been sent. In this sat an Ethiopian eunuch, or chief officer, who was the high treasurer of Candace, the queen of Ethiopia in Africa, and possessed great authority in the management of all public concerns. That country seems to have been generally governed by queens, and Candace was a name commonly given to them. (Marg. Ref. n—p.)—As Cornelius the centurion is supposed to have been the first Gentile convert, it must be concluded that this man was a proselyte to the whole Jewish religion; and not merely a favourer of some of its grand doctrines and precepts. He had, however, taken a very long journey, in order to worship at Jerusalem: where it cannot be supposed that he had heard any thing favourable concerning Jesus, from the priests, scribes, and rulers. Yet his heart was prepared to receive the truth: and, as he rode in his chariot, he employed his time in reading the Scriptures; and that aloud, as it is evident from the narrative, probably that his servants might hear. By an immediate suggestion from the Spirit of God, Philip was ordered to approach the chariot: and, conscious of a divine mission, he without hesitation inquired of the eunuch, whether he understood the things which he read: who, sensible of his disadvantages, and humbly desirous of instruction, was not offended with the question, though proposed by a stranger of inferior rank. On the contrary he allowed, that he could not discover the prophet's meaning, without an interpreter: and, concluding from Philip's address, attire, or appearance, that he could give him information on the subject, he took him up to him into the chariot. 36 And as they went on their way, they came unto a certain water: and the eunuch said, [m]See, here is water; what doth hinder me to be baptized?

37 And Philip said, [n]If thou believest with all thine heart, thou mayest. And [o]he answered and said, [p]I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God.

38 And he commanded the chariot to stand still: and they went down both into water, both Philip and the eunuch; [q]and he baptized him.

39 And when they [r]were come up out of the water, [s]the Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip, that the eunuch saw him no more: [t]and he went on his way rejoicing.

40 But Philip was found [u]at Azotus: and, passing through, [x]he preached in all the cities, till he came to [y]Cæsarea.

Old Testament was first begun at least in Egypt; thence it had found its way into Ethiopia. Greek was understood by superior persons there; and from this translation it is highly probable that, without any other teacher, this Ethiopian obtained the knowledge of the true God; and thus became first a proselyte to Judaism, and then a convert to Christianity: what an abundant encouragement to translating, and dispersing translations of the sacred oracles!—The chief difficulty which the eunuch found in the prophecy, related to the person of whom the sacred writer spoke. 'Was Isaiah thus inhumanly put to death by the Jews? Or did he foretell the sufferings of some future and greater person?' Doddridge. —This is a question which, it might be thought, would force itself on every attentive reader of this extraordinary prophecy. And it gave Philip an opportunity of instructing the Ethiopian in the grand truths of the gospel, to the greatest advantage. We may suppose, that he showed him the circumstantial and exact accomplishment of the prediction, in the Person, doctrine, conduct, sufferings, death, resurrection, and ascension of the Lord Jesus; concerning whom it is most likely that he had heard many disadvantageous reports, whilst at Jerusalem: and also the necessity and nature, the benefit and efficacy of faith in him, as the Saviour of the lost. 'It is probable, that it was in the familiar way of dialogue, ... that Philip continued to instruct this stranger in the doctrine of Christ.' Campbell. (Note, 4.) 'Who can be named either of kings or prophets, to whom these things agree? No one truly.' Grotius de veritate. Yet in his notes on the chapter, this learned writer endeavours to interpret the words concerning the prophet Jeremiah!—He was led, &c. (32,33.) From the LXX: the variations from the Hebrew do not materially alter the meaning.—Bp. Lowth translates the Hebrew of the clause here rendered "In his humiliation his judgment was taken away," "by an oppressive judgment he was taken off."—Man's oppressive judgment was, in our Lord's "humiliation," suffered to take effect, and God did not interpose to hinder it.

V. 36—40. The discourse of Philip, no doubt, comprising abundant instruction, with animated exhortations and persuasions; and the prophecy as shown to coincide with its accomplishment in so wonderful a manner; fully convinced the eunuch, through the concurrent teaching and illumination of the Holy Spirit, that Jesus was the promised Messiah: and he was enabled to understand the nature of his kingdom and salvation. Accordingly, he desired to be numbered among his disciples. Doubtless Philip had shown him the nature of baptism, as the initiatory ordinance of Christianity: when therefore they came to water, he desired to be baptized; of which he was not likely, for a long time, to have any other opportunity; and, steadfastly professing faith in Jesus as "the Messiah, the Son of God," he was baptized by Philip.—Men will form their conjectures concerning the mode in which Philip baptized him, according to their different sentiments on that subject. (Marg. Ref. m—r. Notes, 2:41. Matt. 3:5,6. 28:19,20, v. 19. Mark 1:4—11, v. 5. 1 Pet. 3:21,22, v. 21.) As soon as the eunuch was baptized, the Spirit of God miraculously conveyed Philip away, so that he saw him no more: (Marg. Ref. s. Notes, 1 Kings 18:12—16. 2 Kings 2:16—18. Ez. 3:12—15.) but this rather served to confirm the faith of the Ethiopian: and he went on his way home, "rejoicing," not in his baptism, (for in that Simon Magus might have rejoiced also,) but in Christ, and in his glorious salvation. (Marg. Ref. t.)—History informs us, that this eunuch became a preacher of the gospel, in Ethiopia and the adjacent regions; and there founded a flourishing church, which continued for several ages afterwards; and it is supposed, on very probable grounds, that he was endued with the miraculous power of the Holy Spirit, to qualify him for that service.—Philip being conveyed to Azotus, or Ashdod, proceeded to preach in the several cities on the sea coast, as Joppa, Lydda, and Saron, till he came to Cæsarea, where he afterwards generally resided. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. The death of eminent ministers and Christians ought to be lamented as a public loss to survivors, though it is their own greatest gain; and we should honour their memory, however men may disgrace them, or hate us for our regard to them. But the Lord does not want the services of the most eminent men: (Note, Matt. 14:8—11.) if he permit them to be cut off, when they seem scarcely to have begun their work, or if persecution "make havoc in the church;" he can overrule these events to the glory of his name, and the more extensive promulgation of his gospel. At the same time the most furious enemies cannot touch, or even terrify, those who are most obnoxious to them, unless he permit them.—The glory of his grace often shines forth with peculiar lustre in our view, when we are informed of the manner in which his most honoured servants spent the years preceding their conversion. Who, that witnessed Saul, ready to embrue his hands in the blood of Stephen, and wasting the church like a beast of prey, could have expected that he would at length prove the most eminent of all who ever laboured to promote the Redeemer's cause?—Wherever the true believer is driven, he carries with him his knowledge of the gospel, as an inestimable treasure, not only for his own benefit, but to make others also truly rich; (Note, 2 Cor. 4:7.) and in one way or other he will make known the preciousness of Christ in every place: for when a simple desire of doing good influences the heart, it will be found impossible to exclude a man from all opportunity of usefulness.—Facts authenticate the truth of the gospel, when it is faithfully preached: and though miracles are no longer wrought, yet sinners are converted; and unclean spirits reluctantly quit possession of those over whom they have long reigned with uncontrolled sway: and the gospel brings with it substantial and permanent joy to every heart, house, village, city, or country, in which it is cordially received.

V. 9—13. When the ministers of Christ labour with success, the servants of Satan will endeavour to counteract them. The magicians of Egypt appeared to do the same things with their enchantments which Moses did with his rod; yet the men of God shall in due time obtain a decided victory. (Notes, Ex. 7:11,12,22,23. 8:7,8,18,19. 9:11. 2 Tim. 3:6—9.) Human artifice and satanical influence may effect strange things, to astonish and fascinate the deluded multitude. Thus wicked men may give out that they are "some great ones;" and many, "from the least to the greatest," may give heed to them, as if they "were the great power of God:" but when "the things concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of our Lord Jesus Christ," are powerfully brought home to men's hearts, the charm is dissolved, and the truth rendered triumphant. Indeed, whoever compares the juggles and ambiguous pretences to miracle, or extraordinary operation, that shrink from investigation, which every age produces and fosters, and then detects and despises; with the open, beneficent, incontestable, and disinterested miracles of Christ and his apostles, will easily discern the most manifest difference, or rather the most entire contrariety. The one can only subserve the credit or interest of designing men, and abet delusion, hypocrisy, or immorality; the other evidently tended to promote the best of all causes, even that of truth and holiness: the former have ever sunk into neglect, in proportion as they have been dispassionately examined; the other have been despised by superficial and self-conceited inquirers alone: while men of superior wisdom, piety, and diligence, searching deeply into these matters, have always decidedly borne testimony to their reality and importance. But when impostors have exhausted their ingenuity, in devising schemes for deceiving mankind, they sometimes assume a profession of true religion as their last resource. They avowedly embrace the gospel; they attend on the ordinances of God; they attach themselves to his ministers, as greatly impressed and affected by their words and works: and thus they aspire to a character for sanctity in subserviency to their selfish designs. Nor should we hastily censure those servants of God who are thus imposed upon: the Lord alone "searches the heart;" we know that his grace is sufficient for the chief of sinners; we ought to hope the best of professed believers, till any of them discover their hypocrisy; and men of this description often carry matters very plausibly, till some suitable temptation puts them off their guard, and then they are made manifest in their true character.

V. 14—25. The abundant unction of the Holy Spirit divests men of their narrow and selfish prejudices, and teaches them to own all as brethren who receive the word of God

CHAPTER IX.

Saul, having sought and obtained letters from the high-priest, sets out for Damascus, to persecute the disciples, 1, 2. Drawing near the city, he is surrounded by a light from heaven, and, falling to the earth, hears Jesus expostulating with him, 3—5. He submits, and is led blind to Damascus, where he continues three days without sight or food, 6—9. Ananias is directed in a vision to go to him; by whom he is restored to sight, and baptized, 10—18. Immediately he preaches in the synagogue, with great boldness, 19—22. The Jews seek to kill him, but he escapes from them, 23—25. He goes to Jerusalem, and is by Barnabas introduced to the apostles, 26—28. Preaching boldly in the name of Jesus, his life is in danger, and he is sent to Tarsus, 28, 30. The church has rest, and is edified and multiplied, 31. Peter heals Eneas at Lydda, 32—35; and at Joppa raises Tabitha from the dead, 36—43.

AND [a]Saul, yet [b]breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord, went unto the high-priest,

2 And [c]desired of him letters to Damascus to [d]the synagogues, that if he found any [e]of this way, whether they were men or women, he might bring them bound unto Jerusalem.

3 And [e]as he journeyed, he came near Damascus; and suddenly there shined round about him [f]a light from heaven:

4 And [g]he fell to the earth, and heard a voice saying unto him, [h]Saul, Saul, [i]why persecutest thou me?

5 And he said, [k]Who art thou, Lord? And the Lord said, [l]I am Jesus whom thy persecutest. [m]It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks.

6 And he, [n]trembling and astonished, said, [o]Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? And the Lord and to impart to them some spiritual good as they have opportunity and ability: for in these things there is no room for competition, as no man is impoverished by others being enriched. Yet the carnal mind converts even spiritual gifts into nutriment for ostentation, envy, and ambition: (P. O. 1 Cor. 14:26—40.) selfish hypocrites judge of others by themselves; and covetous men deem a large sum of money an irresistible allurement, and a valuable consideration for the most sacred offices and endowments. Plausible hypocrites are often detected by their desire of pre-eminence, and by devising to render religion subservient to worldly interest. (Notes, 2 Pet. 2:12—19. 3 John 9—12.) But if men attempt to put "filthy lucre" in competition with the truths, ordinances, precepts, gifts, and glory of God; we must abhor their favours and bribes, and warn them that they are in the way of perdition. Indeed, many high and plausible pretensions are sufficiently detected to be base impostures, by the mercenary spirit of those who boast of them; and then set the pretended gift of God to sale, and dispose of it for ready money. (P. O. Ez. 13:17—23.) But, though simoniacal practices are every where exclaimed against, they almost universally insinuate themselves into all things relative to religion!—Commonly those who aspire to be the chief, have "neither part nor lot in the matter;" for a proud and covetous heart cannot be "right in the sight of God." But when we most plainly perceive that men are "in the gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity;" and when we most solemnly warn them of their guilt and danger; we should still exhort them to repent of their wickedness, and to pray to God, if peradventure it may be forgiven.—Men often imagine that their thoughts are free, and have no sin in them; yet "the thought of the heart" may possibly be so atrocious as to exclude a man from repentance and forgiveness. Many desire others to pray for them, who do not humbly pray for themselves; and many at some times dread punishment, who yet resolutely proceed to commit the most horrible impieties. The ministers of Christ, however, must testify against such persons; and preach the gospel of Christ in cities or villages, and in every place as they have opportunity, and then leave the event with the Lord.

V. 26—40. We ought not to be discouraged when called to minister in obscure places, or to few hearers: seldom was more effectual and extensive good done in the most numerous assembly, than followed Philip's preaching to one stranger in a desert: and implicit obedience and submission become the servants of God. He "knows whom he has chosen;" and a thousand incidents, apparently casual, form a part of his great plan, for bringing them to the knowledge of his salvation. In this view nothing can be decidedly deemed little, or unimportant; as we know not what vast effects may be connected with it.—The Lord will have some of all ranks, nations, and complexions, among his redeemed people, to show the power and largeness of his grace. Where he has implanted a desire after himself, he will in due time satisfy it: though such inquirers may go to places, and among persons, where the most religion might be expected, and yet learn nothing of Jesus; and even come away more prejudiced or bewildered than before. (P. O. Matt. 2:1—8.) Those who seek the truth will improve their leisure time in searching the Scriptures; even when they have but small advantages for understanding it. But, alas! how few of our nobles, and ministers of state, study that sacred volume as they ride in their chariots! or willingly take long journeys to inquire after God, or worship him! Surely this Ethiopian will rise up in judgment against them, and condemn them!—Should any one, on some special occasion, be found reading the Scriptures; and should a minister of Christ, in the most grave, courteous, and modest manner, inquire of him whether he understood what he read; it is to be feared, he would resent the question as impertinence. But humility is teachable, and leads to wisdom: and when we are conscious of our ignorance, and willing to gain information even from an inferior or a stranger; we shall not be left without instruction. When God, by means of the Bible alone, excites serious inquiries after the truth; he will send an expositor to obviate difficulties and perplexities: for while many things, and those the most essential, are so plain, that any honest reader may understand them; others require the aid of teachers and interpreters. Thus, while one society disperses the sacred Scriptures, another sends missionaries, both are needful, and there should be no competition between them, but most cordial concurrence in their most excellent designs.—In reading the word of God, we should pause to inquire, of whom, and of what, the sacred writers spoke. But we should especially employ our thoughts about that meek and holy, that patient and suffering Redeemer, who was "led as a sheep to the slaughter, and was dumb as a lamb before the shearer." In his humiliation, his "judgment" and his life "were taken away:" but he is now exalted at the right hand of the Father; his generation as the Son of God is abundantly declared, the generation of the righteous own him as their spiritual Progenitor, and all judgment is vested in him.—Such prophecies are excellent texts from whence to preach Jesus to sinners; for they at the same time explain and demonstrate his doctrine: and as this is the substance of all our preaching, so we may expect that it will be crowned with peculiar success. If we "believe with all our heart, that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God," and profess that faith by such methods as we can, we shall surely be accepted in attending divine ordinances. And when the inquirer after salvation becomes acquainted with Jesus and his precious gospel, he will "go on his way rejoicing," to fill up his station in society, from other motives, and in another manner than before: and thus the conversion of one man may prove a blessing to vast multitudes.—'The communion of saints' on earth, though pleasant, is commonly transient: their different employments and services call them into different places; but under the influence of the same Spirit, they all "serve their generation," and then they will meet before the throne, to part no more, but to join in unceasing and joyful praises to their common Lord and Saviour.

NOTES.—CHAP. IX. V. 1, 2. It is not certainly known in what year Saul was converted: perhaps it might be two or three years after our Lord's ascension. (7:58. Philem. 9.) He, however, persisted in persecuting the disciples for a considerable time, with increasing violence: and he menaced the whole multitude with slaughter and extirpation; as if he could not breathe without uttering threatenings against them, or would, if able, have "slain them with the breath of his lips." (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, 8:1—4. Is. 11:2—5, v. 4. 30:27, 28.) Probably, the diligence and success of those whom he had driven from Jerusalem in propagating the gospel, increased his rage and animosity. Being a zealous volunteer in the service, he devised plans for fully exterminating the religion of Jesus, and was ready to carry them into execution, to the utmost of his ability: and with this view he proposed to the high-priest, (probably Caiaphas,) that he should give him letters from the council and chief priests to the rulers of the synagogues in Damascus; authorizing them to apprehend those who believed in Jesus, and to send them bound to Jerusalem to be punished. (Marg. Ref. c, d. Notes, 22:1—5. 26:9—11.)—The Sanhedrim had no doubt an ecclesiastical authority over the Jewish synagogues in other countries: yet they could not exercise it in many respects without the concurrence of the synagogues themselves, and the connivance of the civil rulers. Damascus had long been the capital city of Syria: it was still very large and populous, and numbers of Jews resided there. It does not clearly appear under whose authority it was at this time; but probably the ruling powers were disposed to concur in the execution of the commission, granted by the high-priest and council of the Jews.—Perhaps some of the persons who had been converted on the day of Pentecost, or soon after, had first carried the gospel thither; and those who had been scattered by the preceding persecution, seem to have laboured successfully among the Jews of that city.

V. 3—6. The disciples at Damascus, when they heard of Saul's commission from the chief priests, (14) would doubtless unite in prayer for deliverance: but it may be questioned, whether one of them thought of that method of deliverance, by which the Lord intended to rescue them. (Notes, 10 14

12:12—17.) For when Saul drew near to the city, and doubtless pleased himself with thinking of the consternation which he was about to excite; he was at once surrounded with a dazzling splendour, like lightning, brighter than that of the meridian sun: and, falling to the ground with terror and amazement, he heard the voice of one calling to him by name repeatedly, and saying, "Why persecutest thou me?" (Marg. Ref. c—i. 10. Gen. 22:1,11. 46:2. Ex. 3:4. 1 Sam. 3:10.) Saul had imagined that he was attempting to extirpate a company of deluded and obstinate heretics, or sectarians; and that he was doing service to God, by his zeal for the law of Moses and the traditions of the elders, against a worthless company of dangerous innovaters: but it now appeared that he was persecuting "the Lord of glory," who considered the cause of the disciples as his own. (Notes, 26:9—11. Gen. 12:1—3. Zech. 2:6—9. John 15:17—25. 16:1—3.) And why did he this? Had they done him any harm? or was there no evidence that Jesus was the Messiah, after all the miracles wrought by him and his apostles? Saul, astonished by this most alarming expostulation, inquired who that glorious Lord was, who thus appeared and spake to him: to which it was answered, that he was Jesus, the Nazarene, whom he had no doubt often derided and blasphemed under that title, and compelled others to blaspheme, and whom he now persecuted in his disciples. (Marg. Ref. k, l. Notes, 26:12—18.) But, as it would be hard, or painful, for a man "to kick against the spikes," by which he could only wound himself; thus Saul could only injure and ruin himself, by contending with One who possessed "all power in heaven and earth." On hearing this, Saul was exceedingly terrified and astonished; probably he dreaded the immediate vengeance of that glorious Lord whom he had so deeply offended: his guilt was undeniable, his pleas were all silenced; and the concurring influence of the Holy Spirit enlightening, convincing, and humbling his heart, he submitted without reserve, and only asked, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do." If mercy could be extended to him, he was prepared for any submission, or self-denial, which might be required of him. Accordingly, he was directed to go into the city, and there to wait for further orders. (Marg. Ref. n—p.) Kick, &c. V. 7. Saul's attendants, who at first fell to the ground as well as he, having recovered themselves, rose up, and stood speechless with terror and amazement. They indeed heard a voice, though they understood nothing of what was spoken; (Note, 22:6—13, v. 9. John 12:27—33, v. 29.) but they saw no man: (Marg. Ref. Note, Dan. 10:4—9.) whereas, Saul in vision saw Jesus in human form, as Stephen had done; (Note, 7:54—60.) and we find, from the account which he afterwards repeatedly gave of this transaction, that much more passed between the Lord and him, than is here recorded. (Notes, 22:14—16. 26:16—18. 1 Cor. 15:3 —11.)

V. 8, 9. Saul now arose from the earth: but, when his eyes were opened, he found that the splendour, with which he had been surrounded, had blinded him. This effect proved the whole transaction to have been a reality, and not merely an illusion of the imagination. (Marg. Ref. s.)—He was therefore led to Damascus; and he entered that city a harmless lamb, though he set out to journey thither with the fierceness of a tiger! We are not informed, whether his attendants were, or were not converted; but this silence seems to indicate that they were not. After his arrival in the city, terror, remorse, anxiety, self-examination, and prayer, with earnest desires of mercy, so occupied his mind, and his body also was so disordered, that he took no sustenance of any kind for three days; for it pleased the Lord to leave him so long to his reflections, before he sent him any relief, or further instruction. (Marg. Ref. t.)—It is impossible to describe what Saul thought, felt, and experienced, during this awful and important interval. There is, however, abundant reason to conclude, that the Holy Spirit enlightened his mind at this time, with a just view of the divine law, in its spirituality and excellency; and thus showed him the worthlessness of his pharisaical righteousness; and his exceedingly heinous guilt, not only in persecuting the Messiah in his followers, but also in his whole conduct, and the state of his heart. This seems to be intimated in some parts of his epistles; and indeed was essentially necessary to a right understanding of that gospel which he was to spend the rest of his life in preaching. (Notes, Rom. 7:9—12. Gal. 1:11—24. 2:17—21.)—With this narrative in view, can we wonder that one, thus "saved by grace," and made an apostle at the very moment when he might most justly have been sent down "quick into hell," should especially delight in expatiating on the divine sovereignty, and on the riches and freeness of "the grace of our God and Saviour," in saving his chosen people? The same doctrines may be distinctly traced in the other parts of Scripture, and abundantly proved from them: but this apostle, snatched as a brand from the burning, and rejoicing with most grateful exultation in his stupendous deliverance and astonishing felicity, with a noble, but highly rational enthusiasm, delights in recurring to the source of all his hopes and joys, and in calling on his brethren to ascribe unreservedly all the glory of their salvation to God alone. Were our humiliation equally deep, and our views of the way in which we have been "called out of darkness into marvellous light," as distinct as his were; few objections to these doctrines, or difficulties concerning them, would trouble our minds: and we should soon perceive the holy tendency and efficacy of them.

They led him by the hand. (8) Χειραγωγουντες. 22:11. Not elsewhere N. T. A Χειραγωγος, 13:11. Ex χειρ, manus, et αγω, duco. This seems to imply, that they were on foot, and not riding, as generally pictured.

V. 10—14. Ananias had previously been a "devout" person, according to the law of Moses: and was now become a disciple of Christ, and probably a preacher of the gospel though it is not likely that he was one of the seventy disciples. (Notes, 22:6—16, vv. 12—16.) To him the Lord Jesus appeared "in a vision," and addressing him also by name, (4) he directed him to go to Saul of Tarsus; who was employed in prayer, and was prepared, by a coincident vision, for his coming to restore his sight, of which he had lately been bereaved.—Saul had been a strict Pharisee, and doubtless had made long, formal, and constant prayers, before this: (Notes, Matt. 6:5—8. 23:14.) but he now prayed as a sinner for salvation, and doubtless to that Saviour whom he had before persecuted. (Marg. Ref. x, z, c.) It was indeed most wonderful, that he who before "breathed out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of Jesus," should now pour out humble prayers to him; and it was a sufficient proof, that he had submitted, and was changed, and therefore ought to be encouraged.—Ananias, however, was astonished at hearing the name of Saul in this connexion: he considered the message on which he was sent, as replete with peril; and he spoke as if forgetful that Jesus had fully known of Saul's previous conduct, or the intent of his journey to Damascus. (Marg. Ref. e, f, h.)—"To call on the name of Jesus," is here used as the distinguished characteristic of a believer.—'The unbelieving Jews say of him, preaching Christ in their synagogues, "Is not this he who wasted those who called on that name in Jerusalem?" (21) Thus St. Paul writes to saints,.... under the title of "all that call upon the name of the Lord Jesus Christ in every place;" (1 Cor. 1:2.) and then in the very next verse, he himself prays, that "grace and peace may be derived on them from God the Father a 16 For [n]I will show him how great things he must suffer [o]for my name's sake.

17 And Ananias went his way, and entered into the house; [p]and putting his hands on him said, [q]Brother Saul, [r]the Lord, even Jesus that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest, hath sent me, [s]that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost.

18 And [t]immediately there fell from his eyes as it had been scales; and he received sight forthwith, and arose, [x]and was baptized.

and from the Lord Jesus Christ." ... And he bids Christians "follow after peace with all those that call upon the Lord with a pure heart;" that is, with all believers; it being the same thing to believe in, and to call upon the name of the Lord Jesus. Hence St. Paul saith, "He that believeth in him shall not be ashamed, because it is written, Whosoever shall call on the name of the LORD shall be saved." (Joel 2:32.) And hence we learn, who that Lord is, whom Ananias bids St. Paul invoke, when he saith, "Arise and be baptized, calling upon the name of the Lord," even the Lord Jesus, who appeared to him; (22:16.) ... and what is meant by that phrase, namely, 'Profess thy faith, by being baptized in, and by calling on his name.' This was a thing so continually practised by the first Christians, that Pliny mentions it in his epistle to Trajan, telling him, that it was the custom of the Christians to sing a hymn to Christ as God. For, St. Paul, in his thirteen first epistles, prays for "grace and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus;" and St. John, in his second epistle, ver. 3, doth the same.' Whitby. Some indeed would render the clause, "are called by thy name:" but the direct meaning of the original, the repetition of the same language in different connexions, and the remarks contained in the quotation just made, are sufficient to show that this translation is absolutely inadmissible. (Notes, 2:14—21, v. 21. Rom. 10:12—17, v. 12,14.)

V. 15, 16. Our Lord at once silenced Ananias's objection, and commanded him to go without delay: as this violent persecutor was "a vessel of election" whom the Lord had foreknown, and meant to employ; that, being filled with the treasure of the gospel, he might convey his name and doctrine among the nations of the earth, and even to their kings, as well as to his people the "children of Israel."—It should be noted, that this precedes in the history the admission of any uncircumcised Gentiles into the church. (Marg. Ref. k—m. Notes, Rom. 9:22,23. 2 Cor. 4:7. 2 Tim. 2:20—22.) At the same time, he would "show him how great things he should suffer for his name's sake," according to the sufferings which he had inflicted on others. (Marg. Ref. n, o.)—Some think that a distinct representation was made in a vision to Saul's mind, of all the various persecutions which he afterwards underwent: at least he had such a discovery made of them, as rendered his subsequent ministry a lively copy of Christ's own example, who foresaw every thing that he was to endure from the very first. He did not, however, fully know the particulars, as many subsequent passages prove. (20:22. 27: 24. Rom. 15:23—28.)

V. 17—22. Ananias, thus admonished, obeyed Jesus without further hesitation. He no longer considered Saul as a persecutor, but as a disciple; and, laying his hands upon him, he called him "Brother Saul;" while he informed him that he was sent to him by the Lord, (even that Jesus whom he had seen by the way, surrounded with awful glory,) in order that he might miraculously be restored to sight, and then made partaker of the Holy Spirit. (Marg. Ref. p—r, t.)—'Ananias, who at most is only supposed to have been one of the seventy disciples, only laid his hands on him, "that he might receive his sight;" and ... he was replenished with the Holy Ghost by the immediate gift of Christ; he being an "apostle not of man, nor by man, but by Christ alone." Gal. 1:1.' Whitby. This appears to have been the case; especially as the conferring of the Holy Spirit, in his miraculous gifts, seems in all cases, previous to that of Cornelius and his friends, to have taken place after baptism. (Note, 10:44—48.)—'It is more probable, that Ananias did not lay hands on him a second time; as we do not elsewhere find that any but the apostles had the power of conferring the Holy Spirit.' Doddridge.—At the words of Ananias, however, "there fell from the eyes" of Saul, "as it were scales," which had occasioned his blindness. These had been an emblem of the benighted state of his soul, amidst the full light of the gospel; as the recovery of his sight, by the power and mercy of Christ, was of his spiritual illumination. (Note, 2 Cor. 4:5,6.) When this token of reconciliation had been granted him, he arose, and, by being baptized, professed himself a disciple of the Lord Jesus; and having thus obtained hope and peace, he took proper refreshment, and found his vigour and strength of body restored to him. These extraordinary events being then made known by Ananias to his brethren, Saul was received among them, and continued some time with them at Damascus: but, instead of delivering his letters to the persons to whom they were addressed, he boldly went to the synagogues, and preached Christ to the Jews there assembled; showing that Jesus was indeed the promised Messiah, and "the Son of God." As his character was well known, and the intent of his journey to Damascus: his change excited the amazement of all men, and probably, in many instances, gave energy to his testimony; though others were offended by it. (Marg. Ref. b—g. Note, 10—13.) But he grew more strong in faith, and more powerful in argument: so that the Jews could by no means answer his reasonings from "the Scripture," proving that Jesus was the promised Messiah, and that all the ancient prophecies had been fulfilled in him.—From his own account, it appears that he received his complete knowledge of the gospel, immediately by revelation from Jesus Christ. (Note, Gal. 1:11—14.)

V. 23—30. When Saul had preached a while at Damascus, he went into Arabia, and laboured there for a considerable time: and after his return to Damascus, the Jews enraged at his supposed apostacy, and his pertinacity in preaching that Jesus was the Messiah, took counsel to slay him. (Gal. 1:17,18.) It seems that Aretas, an Arabian king, had got possession of Damascus at this time; and that the governor appointed by him favoured and abetted the designs against Saul. (2 Cor. 11:32,33.) The Jews either preferred this method of proceeding against him, to sending him bound to Jerusalem; or they had been deprived of that power by a change of the government. Saul, however, providentially discovered and eluded their malice, which was very active, vigilant, and sanguinary, as they had assassins stationed at every gate of that large city, ready to murder him, as soon as ever he approached. (Marg. Ref. i—l. Notes, 23:12—22. 25:1—5.) Having escaped that danger he went from thence to Jerusalem. This was three years after his conversion: yet when he would have joined the Christians there, they questioned his sincerity, and suspected that his enmity to them had only assumed another form; aiming to do them that mischief by subtlety, which before he had effected by violence. (Marg. Ref. m—o.) Damascus was not much above a hundred and fifty miles from Jerusalem; but modern conveniences for a regular correspondence between distant places were then unknown; and some wars in the neighbourhood are supposed to have greatly obstructed the communication. Saul had spent a considerable part of his time in Arabia, in an obscure situation; and the former perils, alarms, and sufferings, which the disciples had experienced from him, had rendered them unreasonably suspicious. But Barnabas, who by some means had obtained fuller information, and had contracted an acquaintance with Saul, introduced him to the apostles Peter and James; the other apostles being absent at that time, no doubt preaching the gospel in different places; and, having given them a satisfactory account of the manner and effects of his conversion, he was admitted to communion with the disciples, both public and private, and soon began to preach among them. (Marg. Ref. p—t. Note, Gal. 1:15—24.) He especially disputed with the Grecians or Hellenists, whom he had before joined against Stephen; (Note, 6:9—14.) and his unanswerable arguments so exasperated them, that they purposed to kill him likewise. He therefore retired to Tarsus, his native city, and preached there and in the adjacent places for some time, till at length Barnabas went, and brought him to Antioch. (Note, 11:25,26.)—It is supposed that the apostle went by land to Tarsus, and that Cæsarea Philippi is meant in the thirtieth verse. (Gal. 1:21. Note, Matt. 16:13—16.)

V. 31. When Saul, the grand instrument of persecution, was become a zealous preacher, and was removed out of the reach of his enemies, the persons concerned seem to have been disheartened. Other causes likewise concurring, the persecution was suspended, and the churches were left in peace. This opportunity they diligently improved to edify one another in knowledge, faith, and every good thing; and to settle all the concerns of the several churches, in order to the regular administration of divine ordinances. The disciples likewise "walked in the fear of the Lord," or habitually conducted themselves with reverential regard to the authority of God, as his upright worshippers; and enjoyed much comfort, and were animated in obedience, by the power of the Holy Spirit, in the hope and peace of the gospel: and thus many others were won over to them, and their numbers were continually increased in each church, and churches were formed in other places.—[c] Their shining piety above others and their great joy in the Holy Ghost attracting others to the faith.' Whitby. (Note, Zech. 8:20—23.)—[c] The edification of the church is the event of persecution, provided the Lord be patiently waited for.' Beza. (Marg. Ref.)—The conversion of Saul, from a furious and most active persecutor, to a zealous, unwearied, and self-denying preacher of the gospel, and his subsequent labours and sufferings in the cause, for a long course of years, is an undoubted fact, which ought to be accounted for by all, who have the least doubt of the divine original of Christianity. If his own narrative be admitted, Christianity is without doubt divine, and the only true religion; and those who hesitate to admit his testimony in its full latitude, are required, in support of their cause, to give some other rational and probable account of so unparalleled an event.

V. 32—35. Little has been thus far recorded concerning the labours of the apostles, except at Jerusalem; though doubtless they incessantly endeavoured to propagate the gospel in every way which they could. Here, however, we find that Peter made a circuit through various parts of the land of Judea, and the adjacent parts, probably to visit the places where the gospel had been planted, by those whom the persecution had scattered: and coming to "the saints," or believers, at Lydda, a town near the shore of the Mediterranean Sea, he wrought a miracle, "in the name of Jesus," and by his power, which was the means of convincing and converting to the faith of Christ, many of the inhabitants of that and the adjacent country: so that they believed him to be "the Lord," the Messiah, and became his disciples. (Marg. Ref.) "Eneas, Jesus the Christ, healeth thee." (34) 'It is worth our while to observe the great difference that there is between the manner in which this miracle was wrought by Peter, and that in which Christ performed his works of divine power and goodness.' Doddridge. (8:40.) It is highly probable, that the gospel was introduced at Lydda by his ministry: and that Eneas was made known to Peter, as an afflicted person favourable to the gospel.

V. 36—43. The words Tabitha, and Dorcas, the one Syriac, and the other Greek, signify a hind, or doe; but whether this pious woman was thus named for any particular reason, or not, is uncertain. (Marg. and Ref.)—'The reason why St. Luke gives this interpretation of her Syriac name, seems . . . to be this, that she being a graecizing Jewess, was called by the first name by the Jews, and by the second among the Greeks.' Whitby.—She was a peculiar ornament to the gospel, which she had embraced: for she so abounded in good works and almsdeeds, that her whole life was a continued succession of them; as a tree is full of fruit, when every branch is loaded with it. (Marg. Ref. r, s. Notes, John 15:6—8, v. 8. Phil. 1:9—11, v. 11.) She not only gave away her substance; but she employed her time and skill in labouring diligently and constantly, for the poor widows and other believers: so that her death was considered as a public loss. The principal persons, therefore, among the disciples, having heard of Peter's miracle at Lydda, which was but about six miles from Joppa, (Marg. Ref. q, x,) sent for him, in hopes that he would be enabled to restore her to life again; which evinced very strong faith, as it does not appear that any apostle had hitherto wrought a miracle of this kind. When he came, and had witnessed the deep mourning of those, who expressed at once their gratitude and their loss, by showing the garments which Dorcas had made for them, "while she was with them;" he went alone into the room where she lay, and there prevailed by prayer for her restoration to life. (Marg. Ref. y—b.) In performing this miracle Peter used words, in some respects like what Jesus had employed on similar occasions; but he had prefaced it with humble prayer upon his knees. (Notes, 1 Kings 17:20—24. 2 Kings 4:33—35. John 11:41—46.) He was doubtless assured, that this request was granted, before he addressed Dorcas. His words were not, "I say unto thee, Arise," in the language of authority, but simply, "Tabitha, arise," as an intimation that Jesus had restored her life: and it should also be remembered that there was no witness to the transaction. This miracle was not only a high gratification and valuable benefit to the admiring thankful company of believers; but it was the means also of converting very many to the faith. Peter therefore, finding an opening for usefulness at Joppa, continued there for some time, lodging at the house of one Simon a tanner, and not with Tabitha; perhaps, lest he should seem to receive a recompense for the exercise of his miraculous powers. (Notes, 8:18—24. Matt. 10:7,8.)—It is remarkable, that there is no instance in Scripture of a prophet, or eminent minister of religion, being raised from the dead; (for it does not appear, that St. Paul was entirely dead, when he had been stoned at Lystra; Note, 14:19,20.) and but few of their miraculous recoveries from sickness: though we should perhaps have thought, that these were the most proper cases for a divine interposition.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. The power of doing evil has seldom been adequate to the inclination, even in those who have been most successful persecutors and destroyers in the church, or in the world: for could scourges of God execute their threatenings, as readily as they utter them, their very breath would be fatal to mankind, and especially to the disciples of the Lord.—The restraints providentially imposed upon us, previous to our conversion, prevent much mischief; or the deplorable history of our past lives would have been still worse.—Even when sinners are most eager to execute their rebellious purposes, the Lord sometimes discovers his designs of mercy towards them: and thus the extremity of their wickedness illustrates the infinite riches and power of his grace.—While we are praying, in imminent dangers or overwhelming troubles, we are apt to be discouraged, if we can see no way by which we may be delivered: but he, who in a moment is able to change furious persecutors into zealous preachers, can perform his promises by various methods, of which we have not the least conception.—The manifested light and glory of the divine justice, holiness, and power, would sink the stoutest rebel on earth to despair at once, if it were not accompanied with some indications of mercy and grace: but the Lord sends convictions and terrors to abase men in the dust, that their hearts may be prepared for "peace and joy in believing."—No man can have a good or even a plausible reason for rebellion against the authority of God: he has given no cause for it, nor can any good come of it, but directly the contrary: for "it is hard to kick against the pricks." Little do proud Pharisees and despisers of the gospel imagine, while indulging their contempt and hatred of those whom they deem wild enthusiasts or obstinate sectaries, that they are persecuting the Lord himself, and that he will resent it accordingly. He is One with his disciples, and they with him: he will requite every favour done to them, as if done to himself; and whoever injures them touches "the apple of his eye." But opposers of the gospel do not generally believe, that Jesus is "the Lord of glory;" and that all their hard speeches and strenuous endeavours against him, are a direct attack upon the Lord of Hosts himself. (Note, Jude 14—16.) When he shall therefore appear, in far more terrible majesty, than he did to Saul of Tarsus; they will tremble with astonishment at the awful consequences of that conduct, in which they now perhaps imagine there is much merit, or by which they seek renown.—When a sinner is brought to a proper sense of his own state, character, and conduct, he will submit without reserve; allowing that he might justly be left to perish; casting himself wholly on the mercy of the divine Saviour, and inquiring what he would have him to do. This will thenceforth be the language of his heart and prayers continually: 'What must I do to be saved? In what way must I come? What means shall I use? What method shall I take to obtain assurance of my reconciliation? What return can I make for thy mercy? How shall I recommend thy salvation to others? Shall I enter upon this or the other business, or not? How shall I behave in these circumstances, or manage this matter? These, and such like questions, the believer will have daily to propose to the Lord, in faith and prayer; desiring to be taught, inclined, and enabled to know and do his will. (Note, Col. 3:16,17. v. 16.) When this submission has been made, the Lord takes the humbled penitent under his direction, and teaches him what he would have him to do: yet he does not show him the whole at once, but gradually, as it becomes necessary: and he uses his servants as instruments in this work; that his appointments may be honoured, and 'the communion of the saints' may be promoted. Nor does he generally bring transgressors to "peace and joy in believing," without such previous rebukes, sorrows, and distresses of conscience, as may evince the atrociousness of their crimes, and lay a foundation for their future humility, gratitude, patience, and meekness.—Under great remorse of conscience, and when the soul is deeply engaged about eternal things, a man loses his desire after animal recreation: so that fasting in such circumstances is often a matter of course, rather than an imposed duty. But happy are they, who thus sow in tears, that they may reap in joy! (Note, Ps. 126:5,6. P. O. Notes, Matt. 5:4. 2 Cor. 7:9—11.)

V. 10—22. "Behold he," the proud Pharisee, or the prouder infidel, "prayeth;" in that manner which the Saviour notices with cordial approbation! Behold the licentious profligate, the iniquitous publican, the unmerciful oppressor, or the daring blasphemer, "prayeth!" What happy tidings are these, when well authenticated, to such as understand the nature and efficacy of prayer; of such prayer, as the humbled sinner presents before a merciful God, for the blessings of eternal salvation!—Yet, even eminent disciples are sometimes staggered at the commands of their gracious Lord, though they express their readiness to obey: and while they allow, in general, the infinite sufficiency of his mercy, they are apt to assign limits to it in particular instances, according to their several prejudices and passions! But the Lord is peculiarly glorified in far exceeding all our limitations, and scanty expectations; and in showing that they are "the chosen vessels of his mercy," whom we are ready to consider as the objects of his most righteous vengeance: nay, that perhaps, he intends them to do and to suffer more in his cause, and for his sake, than those who stand highest in our estimation. This was the case with him who had done so "much evil to the saints" of the Lord Jesus at Jerusalem, and was preparing to do all he could against those who called on his name at Damascus; and in more obscure instances, the same is taking place continually.—He expects implicit obedience from his servants: all their objections arise from unbelief; and when they are in a right frame of mind, they would go even into the lion's den, should their obedience require it, assured that he will be with them, to support or deliver them.—Converting grace renders believers the children of the same Father, abolishes their former distinctions, and terminates their enmities: and, when the bitterest foe, or the vilest malefactor, becomes a real disciple, we are required to own and to love him as a "brother," without any upbraidings, prejudice, or resentment; and we should rejoice to be useful to him, either in his temporal or spiritual concerns.—The efficacious teaching of the Holy Spirit causes "the scales" of ignorance, prejudice, and pride to fall from the eyes of the understanding, which before excluded the clear light of the gospel: then the sinner receives his sight, and professes the faith which once he despised: then he passes from the kingdom of Satan to that of God; (Notes

CHAPTER X.

Cornelius, a devout centurion in Cesarea, but a Gentile, being directed by an angel, sends for Peter to instruct him, 1—8; who in the mean time is prepared by a vision, 9—16; and, being commanded by the Spirit, he, attended by certain disciples, accompanies the messengers, 17—23. Cornelius renders undue honour to Peter, who declines it, 24—26; and shows the occasion of his sending for him, avowing the readiness of himself and his friends to receive the word of God from him, 27—33. Peter preaches to them Jesus, and salvation by faith in him, 34—43. The Holy Spirit is poured out on he company, as on the apostles on the day of Pentecost; and Peter commands them to be baptized, 44—48.

V. 23—31. While many, who witness the effects of the gospel, are amazed, only a few in comparison are effectually convinced by them. Even Saul's conversion, though it is, at this day, a real demonstration of the truth of Christianity, a fact that can neither be doubted, nor accounted for upon any other principle; even when it first took place, and when it concurred with his convincing arguments, and most stupendous miracles, could not of itself effect the conversion of one enemy to the gospel: for nothing can produce true faith, but that power which new creates the heart. (Notes, and P. O. Luke 16:27—31.) Thus the Jews, both at Damascus and Jerusalem, rejected Saul's unexceptionable testimony, and sought to kill him; as he had sought the destruction of those who had been Christians before him!—True believers are apt to carry their suspicions too far, in respect of those against whom they have imbibed strong prejudices, and from whom they have received great injuries. Indeed the world is so full of deceit, and the visible church of hypocrisy, that it is hard for us to be sufficiently cautious, without verging to the extreme. The Lord, however, will clear up the characters of the upright; he will bring them acquainted with his people; and give them opportunities of bearing testimony to his truth, perhaps before those with whom they once concurred in enmity and opposition to it. He sees good to prove his churches by tribulations and persecutions: but by taking off their enemies, converting some and dismaying others, or finding them other employment, he gives seasons of rest and peace, in which we should diligently edify ourselves and each other, that we may be prepared for future trials, in case they should be allotted us.—When believers walk conscientiously, "in the fear of the Lord, and in the comfort of the Holy Spirit," they appear to be an excellent and happy people, and are generally multiplied: and it behooves us to watch against dejection or melancholy, as much as against known sin; for it prejudices the minds of unbelievers against the truth, and renders them afraid of it, as only productive of dejection and discomfort.

V. 32—43. The unwearied labours of the primitive preachers of the gospel should be studied and imitated, by all their successors in the ministry: and the displays of the power and grace of Christ should encourage us, in all our difficulties. He can heal our bodies or our souls of the most inveterate maladies, whenever he pleases: his long delays do not prove that he never intends to deliver us; and he can make our tedious afflictions or temptations, and our merciful deliverances, the means of saving the souls of those around us, and of greatly displaying the glory of his power, mercy, and truth.—While we live upon the fulness of Christ, for our whole salvation, we ourselves should desire to be "full of good works and alms-deeds," for the honour of his name and the benefit of his saints. Then those who go before us will be witnesses in heaven, and they who survive us will testify on earth, to the reality of our faith and love. (Note, Luke 16:9—13. Notes, and P. O. 2 Cor. 9:8—15.)—Many seem to think that none can glorify Christ, or help to promote his gospel, except ministers: but such persons as Tabitha are as much wanted, and are as useful in their places, even as able faithful preachers: for while the latter proclaim the truths of the gospel by their word; the other substantiate, illustrate, and demonstrate the excellency of them, in their lives. How mean then is the grovelling ambition of those numerous females, who aspire to no higher distinction than that of external personal decoration and accomplishment, and who waste their lives in trifling pursuits; when multiplied charities and labours of love, might have rendered them, at less expense of time and treasure, a blessing to multitudes, and an ornament to Christianity! When such triflers die, all dies with them, and their loss is not greatly either felt or lamented: while even such as have had little in their power, and have "laboured, working with their own hands," that they might relieve the poor and needy, will be substantially useful through life, and "sincerely lamented at death; and" their "works follow them," and will be graciously rewarded in heaven. We cannot expect, nor should we desire, the return to life of those who have thus "served their generation, and are fallen asleep:" yet the presence, conversation, and prayers of faithful ministers, may be a benefit to the survivors; and they should ever be ready to embrace opportunities of comforting the mourners, and giving a salutary turn to their sorrows. The Lord can make up every loss; he overrules every event for the good of those who trust in him, and for the glory of his own name: and unostentatious piety, disinterested diligence, and indifference about outward accommodations, should mark the whole conduct of those who preach the gospel of God our Saviour.

NOTES.—CHAP. X. V. 1, 2. Hitherto none had been admitted, by baptism, into the Christian church, but Jews, Samaritans, and proselytes; who all were circumcised persons, and observed the ceremonial law: but the time was now come, when the Gentiles were to be openly called, to share all the privileges of the people of God; without being proselyted to Judaism, either before or after their conversion to Christianity.—The character of the person whom God was pleased to select, as the first-fruits of this harvest from among the Gentiles, was suited (as much as any thing could be,) to abate the prejudice of the Jewish converts against the alteration. Cornelius was a centurion, or the commander of a hundred men, in "the Italian band," or cohort, of Roman soldiers, which attended the governor, who at this time generally resided at Cesarea. (Marg. Ref. a, c.) It may be supposed that Cornelius, if a native of Italy, would think it a trial, to be sent so far from his country and all his connexions: for the Cornelii were an illustrious family at Rome. Yet in Judea he became acquainted with the true God; and, renouncing idolatry, he worshipped him with reverence and obedient attention. He taught his family to do the same, and was a liberal friend to the poor Jews among whom he resided; he was constant in his devotions, probably with his family, as well as in secret; and he set apart seasons for fasting and prayer, as it is reasonable to conclude, to seek further directions from God respecting his truth and will. (Marg. Ref. d—h. Notes, 13:1—3. Dan. 9:2,3. 10:1—3. John 1:47—51, v. 48.) He was in some measure acquainted with the Scriptures, and the promises of a Messiah by means of the Greek translation, as it is most probable: though it may be questioned whether he had learned to rely on him, as a spiritual Redeemer who was to come.—Many writers are very full and exact, about two sorts of proselytes to the Jewish religion; and others argue against that distinction: but the nature of the case, and the facts recorded in Scripture, render it evident, that some of the Gentiles were circumcised, professed obedience to the whole Mosaic law, and were completely incorporated among the native Jews; and that others became worshippers of the true God, and professed obedience to the moral precepts, who were not circumcised, nor observant of the ceremonial law. Of this latter description Cornelius was; and therefore considered entirely as a Gentile, though of good report among the Jews.—'The Jews accounted them unclean as well as the other Gentiles: ... yet ... they deemed the alms they gave to the Jews clean; ... and because Cornelius was free in giving to the Jews of Cesarea, he was a man of good report among them all. (22)' Whitby. (Notes, Matt. 8:5—13. Luke 7:1—10.) The promised Saviour, however, was now come, and the way of salvation by him was openly preached: it was therefore proper, that all "who feared God" should explicitly believe in him, and profess themselves his disciples. There was evidently a preparation in the heart of Cornelius, for the reception of the gospel; he had doubtless a true faith in the word of God, as far as he understood it though he had not an explicit faith in Christ. (Note, 8:26—31.) This preparation and faith were the fruits of the regenerating Spirit of God, who was given to him through the mediation of Jesus, even before he knew him; and this indeed is the case with every man, when "God who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved him, even when dead h ase is by the sea-side: [u]he shall tell thee what thou oughtest to do.

7 And when the angel which spake unto Cornelius was departed, he called [x]two of his household servants, [y]and a devout soldier of them that waited on him continually;

8 And when he had declared all these things unto them, [z]he sent them to Joppa.

[Practical Observations.]

9 ¶ On the morrow, as they went on their journey, and drew nigh unto the city, [a]Peter went up upon the house-top to pray, about [b]the sixth hour:

10 And [c]he became very hungry, and would have eaten; but, while they made ready, [d]he fell into a trance,

11 And [e]saw heaven opened, [f]and a certain vessel descending unto him, as it had been a great sheet knit at the four corners, and let down to the earth;

12 Wherein [g]were all manner of four-footed beasts of the earth, and wild beasts, and creeping things, and fowls of the air.

13 And there came a voice to him, [h]Rise, Peter; kill, and eat.

14 But Peter said, [i]Not so, Lord; [k]for I have never eaten any thing that is common or unclean.

15 And the voice spake unto him again the second time, [l]What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common.

16 This was done [m]thrice: and the vessel was received up again into heaven.

in sin," at first "quickens him together with Christ." (Note, Eph. 2:1—10, vv. 4,5.) Had it been possible for Cornelius, in this state of mind, to have refused the salvation of Christ when proposed to him; he would not have been saved by his works: but this could not be, for God had prepared and inclined him to welcome the gospel, because he intended to call him to believe it; so that he could neither be saved without faith in Christ, nor could he perish through want of it. It is mere trifling to inquire, as many have done, what his state would have been, had he died after his prayers were heard, and before he had believed in Christ; for it goes upon the absurd supposition of the Lord's beginning a work, and not bringing it to the intended completion. It is a universal rule, that whatever is from God of a spiritual and holy nature, will for Christ's sake be accepted by him: but it may be doubted whether he ever communicates regenerating grace to an adult person, where he has not given, or does not mean to send, some measure of the light of his word: though it does not behoove us to limit his mercy; nor can we tell how small a portion of divine truth may be the seed or the food of divine life in the soul. This we may know certainly, that no regenerate man will finally reject the gospel, when proposed to him.—Many objections and reasonings, and much perplexity on this subject among persons of contrary systems, seem to arise from inattention to this truth; that nothing spiritually good, or acceptable to God, can be produced from the heart of fallen man, except by the regenerating Spirit of Christ: where that is communicated, all things necessary to salvation will in due time follow; yet when, or in what order, cannot be previously ascertained. (Notes, John 1:10—13, vv. 12,13. 3:3—8.) But many things good, in the estimation of man, and many specious appearances of evangelical religion, are as distinct from spirituality and holiness, or the choice and love of the holy excellency of God and heavenly things; as polished brass in its highest perfection, is different from pure gold. (Note, Luke 16:14,15.) Perhaps these observations may assist the reader, in understanding this interesting chapter; which cannot easily be made to accord with the exactness of systematical writers of different creeds, on these subjects.—The Italian band. (1) 'Many, with Grotius, have explained this, as if the meaning were, that Cornelius was a centurion of one of the cohorts belonging to the Italian legion. ... But I refer the reader to the many learned and judicious things which Mr. Biscoe has said, (Boyle's Lectures,) to show that the Italian legion did not exist at this time. ... I think it exceedingly probable, for the reasons which he urges, that this was a cohort different from any of the legionary ones; and consequently that Luke has here expressed himself with his usual accuracy; and that the mistake lies, as it generally does, in those who think they have learning enough to correct him. It is probable, that this was called the Italian cohort, because most of the soldiers belonging to it were Italians.' Doddridge. Instead of generally, always would have been more proper.

V. 3—8. Cornelius, influenced by divine grace, was acting conscientiously, and waiting for clearer discoveries of the will of God: and, when he was keeping a solemn fast, and praying at the hour of the evening sacrifice, as one of the stated hours of prayer; (Marg Ref. i, k. 30. Notes, 3:1—11, v. 1. Dan. 9:21—23.) he saw, in a vision, an angel in human form and shining garments, who addressed him by name as he entered his apartment. Being greatly alarmed at the vision, (as probably his doors were fastened,) and aware that this was a heavenly visitant, he desired in the language of reverence, to know what was the meaning of his coming. The angel then assured him, that "his alms and prayers were come up before God" with acceptance; who was, as it were, reminded by them of his promises and purposes to do him good. (Marg. Ref. l—p. Notes, Ps. 10:17,18. Prov. 2:1—8. Is. 62:6,7. Luke 1:11—17. John 1:47—51, v. 48. Rom. 8:24—27.) He therefore was come, not to be his instructer, but to direct him to send for Peter to Joppa; who would show to him the way of truth and salvation, about which he was earnestly inquiring. (Note, 11:4—17, vv. 13,14.) Thus the angel left it to the apostle to preach the gospel to Cornelius, that the sacred ministry might be honoured, and that he might become acquainted with the disciples of Christ for his future benefit. Peter, the apostle of the circumcision, by whose preaching the foundation of the church of converted Jews was laid, on the day of Pentecost, was chosen on this occasion, rather than Paul the intended apostle of the Gentiles; probably, that the unprecedented admission of uncircumcised persons, into the church, might give as little offence to the Jewish converts as possible.—Philip, the evangelist, seems to have been at Cesarea at this time; yet it did not please God to employ him in the case of Cornelius, as he had done in that of the Ethiopian treasurer. (Notes, 8:26—40.) Cornelius receiving these directions, and having pious servants and soldiers, through the influence of his example and instructions, immediately sent three messengers to Joppa, to inquire for a man, of whom he had probably never heard, before the angel made him known to him, with special directions where to find him. (9:43. Marg. Ref. u—z.) It does not appear that Cornelius had the least acquaintance with the Christians at or near Cesarea.—His intercourse with the unbelieving Jews was suited rather to increase than remove his prejudices: and, as far as it can now be judged, the reading of the Greek translation of the Scriptures was the principal and almost sole means by which effects so beneficial and excellent had been produced. (Note, 8:32—35, v. 32.)

V. 9—16. 'Peter, after he had received the Holy Spirit, needed to make daily proficiency in the knowledge of the benefit of Christ.' Beza. (Note, 3:19—21.) The prejudices of Peter were so strong against uncircumcised persons, that the report of Cornelius's vision would not have satisfied his mind, as to the propriety of going to him, unless the Lord had likewise by other means prepared him for the service. (Notes, 11:1—18.)—When the messengers drew near to Joppa, Peter had retired for prayer to some convenient solitude, which he had upon the top of the house, it being then about noon; for, like David and Daniel, he prayed at least three times a day. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, Ps. 55:16, 17, v. 17. Dan. 6:10,11.) While he was there, he became uncommonly hungry, and would gladly have eaten; but, before his ordinary repast was ready, he fell into a trance, or ecstasy; in which his senses were closed to external objects, but invisible things were presented to his mind, as if he saw them with his eyes. (Marg. Ref. c, d. Notes, 7:54—60. 22: 17—21. 2 Cor. 12:1—6.) In this state there appeared to him a great vessel, resembling a very large sheet, or wrapper, of which the four corners were fastened together: this seemed to come down from heaven to the earth; and upon further observing it, he found that it contained all kinds of living creatures, especially, if not exclusively, all those animals, which were unclean according to the law. At the same time he heard a voice directing him to satisfy his hunger, by immediately killing and eating whatever he chose. To this

17 Now, [n]while Peter doubted in himself what this vision which he had seen should mean, behold, [o]the men which were sent from Cornelius had made inquiry for Simon's house, and stood before the gate, 18 And called, [p]and asked whether Simon, which was surnamed Peter, were lodged there.

19 ¶ While Peter thought on the vision, [q]the Spirit said unto him, Behold, three men seek thee.

20 Arise therefore, [r]and get thee down, and go with them, doubting nothing: [s]for I have sent them.

21 Then Peter went down to the men which were sent unto him from Cornelius, and said, [t]Behold, I am he whom ye seek: [u]what is the cause wherefore ye are come?

22 And they said, [x]Cornelius the centurion, [y]a just man, and one that feareth God, and [z]of good report among all the nation of the Jews, was warned from God by a holy angel to send for thee into his house, [a]and to hear words of thee.

23 Then called he them in, [b]and lodged them. And [c]on the morrow Peter went away with them, [d]and certain brethren from Joppa accompanied him. [Practical Observations.]

24 And [e]the morrow after, they entered into Cesarea. And Cornelius waited for them, [f]and had called together his kinsmen and near friends.

25 And as Peter was coming in, Cornelius met him, [g]and fell down at his feet and worshipped him.

26 But Peter took him up, saying, [h]Stand up; I myself also am a man.

27 And as he talked with him, he went in, [i]and found many that were come together.

28 And he said unto them, Ye know how [k]that it is an unlawful thing for a man that is a Jew to keep company, or come unto one of another nation; [l]but God hath showed me, that I should not call any man common or unclean.

29 Therefore came I unto you without gainsaying, [m]as soon as I was sent for: [n]I ask therefore for what intent ye have sent for me?

he decidedly objected, though he supposed it to be the voice of the Lord; as he had always observed the ritual law, in this matter, with the most scrupulous exactness. To this objection it was replied, "What God hath cleansed," that "call not thou common," or polluted. (Marg. Ref. g—l.) To impress his mind more deeply, and to show the certainty of the inference to be drawn from it, the transaction was thrice repeated, and then the whole vision disappeared. (Gen. 41:32. John 21:17. 2 Cor. 13:1.)—The same law, which established the distinction between clean and unclean meats, had also marked the distinction between Jews and Gentiles, and restricted their intercourse with each other: but the pride and bigotry of the Jews had carried the separation further than the law required; and had even produced a contempt of the Gentiles, however friendly or conscientious. The law also concerning the distinction of meats and of animals had both been an emblem of the distinction between clean and unclean persons, and a means of preserving it. (Notes, Gen. 7:2,3. 8:20—22. Lev. 1:1,2. 11:1—8. Rom. 14: 13—18. 1 Tim. 4:1—5.)—'Being thus separated by this precept,' (concerning clean and unclean meats,) 'from all familiar converse with other nations: hence they came to look on them who did not use this abstinence, as unclean, because they did freely eat of those things which the law made unclean to them; and to say the unclean beasts did signify the people of the world!' Whithy.—Call not thou common. (15) ..."Do not thou pollute." Gr. 'It was the priests' office, in case of leprosy, and other matters of a like nature, to pronounce the thing or person under examination, clean or unclean. In the Hebrew it is thus expressed, "The priest shall cleanse,"..."The priest shall pollute him."... What God hath cleansed, that is by this vision and command declared to be clean, do not thou pollute, that is, pronounce not thou unclean.' Whithy. To inform a Jew, that God had cleansed those animals which before had been declared unclean, and that they were no longer to be deemed common, or rejected as such, was in fact to announce the abrogation of the Mosaic law, and the introduction of another and more enlarged dispensation; and it plainly intimated, that uncircumcised Gentiles, whom God cleansed by faith and grace, were to be received into the church, without regard to the ceremonial law, or to their uncleanness according to it. (Notes, 15:7—11. Eph. 2:14—18. Col. 2:13—15.)—This great vessel might therefore signify the Christian church, as living under the full revelation of the new covenant of grace, the origin of which is from heaven, though its place is on earth. Its security, by the promise, oath, and covenant of God, and the engagements of his unchangeable wisdom, power, truth, and love, may also be intimated by the vessel being knit at the four corners: The animals of various species may represent sinners of every nation, description, and previous character, as gathered into the church by the preaching of the gospel, and by faith and grace: (Note, Is. 11:6—9.) and the voice, repeatedly addressing Peter, evidently meant, that he should thenceforth associate with converts to Christ, from among the Gentiles, and make no distinction between them and the Jewish disciples, for God had cleansed them; and that he should preach to the Gentiles, even as to the Jews, for God intended to cleanse them also. (Notes, 27—33. 11:1—3. Gal. 2:11—16.)

V. 17—23. Peter did not readily understand the import of this vision; though he knew that it contained some weighty instruction, which he diligently applied his mind to discover. (Marg. Ref. n.) Whilst he was thus engaged in deep reflection, the messengers of Cornelius arrived and inquired for him: but to satisfy his mind more fully, in a case that implied in its consequences the abolition of the ritual law, which God himself had given to Israel, this fact was immediately revealed to him; and he was ordered to go with the messengers without scruple or hesitation.—God had directed Cornelius, by the angel, to send these messengers, yet "the Spirit said to Peter, I have sent them:" this is the language of Deity and personality. (20. Marg. Ref. q—s.) Accordingly Peter, having heard their report concerning Cornelius's character and vision, (Notes, 1,2. Job 1:1.) hospitably entertained them till the next day, and then went with them. But he took with him some of the believers, who dwelt at Joppa: that they might witness, and be ready to attest, the whole of what passed on this unprecedented occasion. (Notes, 11:1—18.)

V. 24—26. Cornelius, expecting a satisfactory discovery of the divine will from Peter, had collected his relations and intimate friends, (who, though Gentiles, were previously disposed to receive instruction, even as he was,) that they might share the benefit. (Marg. Ref. f. 33) Peter had been made known to him in so extraordinary a manner, that Cornelius seems to have supposed he must be something more than man: perhaps he thought that he was the Messiah, of whom he had read such glorious things in the writings of the prophets. He, however, prostrated himself before the apostle, and rendered him such homage, as Peter deemed improper to be received by any one who was only a man like himself, and therefore he resolutely rejected it; yet Jesus continually accepted of the very same. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Notes. Matt. 14:33. 15:25—28. Mark 5:21—24.)—'If the worship, intended and given by Cornelius, was religious worship, . . . Peter declares such worship was not to be given to a mere man: if it was only civil worship; he who thought it not fit to receive that, would much less have received religious worship.' Whithy. 'Religious worship belongs to God alone; but civil and immoderate must not be rendered even to apostles, when present, much less when absent, and dead; and much less to their tombs. . . . If Cornelius had desired to kiss Peter's toe, would Peter have allowed him? Yet truly it is Peter's vicegerent, who requires kings to kiss his slipper!' Beza. (Notes, Rev. 19:9,10. 22:8,9.)

30 And Cornelius said, [o]Four days ago [p]I was fasting until this hour; and at the ninth hour I prayed in my house, [q]and, behold, a man stood before me in bright clothing, 31 And said, Cornelius, [r]thy prayer is heard, and thine alms [s]are had in remembrance in the sight of God.

32 Send [t]therefore to Joppa, and call hither Simon, whose surname is Peter; he is lodged in the house of one Simon a tanner, by the seaside: who, when he cometh, shall speak unto thee.

33 Immediately therefore I sent to thee, and thou hast well done that thou art come. Now therefore [u]are we all here present before God, to hear all things that are commanded thee of God.

34 ¶ Then Peter [x]opened his mouth, and said, [y]Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons:

38 How [i]God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost, and with power; [k]who went about doing good, [l]and healing all that were oppressed of the devil: [m]for God was with him.

39 And [n]we are witnesses of all things which he did, both in the land of the Jews, and in Jerusalem; [o]whom they slew, and hanged on a tree:

V. 27—33. When Peter had entered the house, in which so many uncircumcised persons were collected; he observed to them, that they knew it to be contrary to the law of Moses, for a Jew to associate with those of another nation; but God had showed him, that this distinction was no longer to be strictly adhered to. (Marg. Ref. i—l.) He had therefore come to them without saying any thing to the contrary; and he now desired to be more particularly informed, on what account he had been sent for. Upon which Cornelius repeated the substance of his vision; (Marg. Ref. o—s. Note, 3—8.) expressed his satisfaction in his having come to them so readily; and assured him that he and his friends were met together, as in the immediate presence of God, and prepared to give an implicit assent and a cordial welcome to the divine message which he was about to deliver, whatever it might be. (Marg. Ref. u. Notes, 17:10—15. Jer. 42:1—6,20—22.) The circumstances preceding Peter's coming to Cornelius and his friends, rendered an implicit faith in his words most reasonable and proper, even previous to a comparison of them with the sacred oracles, the standard and test of truth.—Unlawful. (28) Note, 9—16.—The unlawfulness of the Jews associating with uncircumcised persons, and those who did not observe the ritual law, seems to have been generally inferred from the restriction laid on such intercourse, by the distinction of meats and other ceremonies: for it is not forbidden by any express law.

V. 34, 35. The circumstances of this transaction so impressed the apostle's mind, that he opened his discourse by allowing, that he had been erroneously prejudiced, in favour of the Jews, and against the Gentiles: for he was now convinced, that "God was no respecter of persons."—"To respect persons," is entirely different from discriminating characters, or conferring unmerited favours on one man, and not on another. A judge respects persons, if he condemns one and acquits another, or decides in favour of the injurious party, from partiality to his friend, or to one of his own nation, sect, or party: (Marg. Ref. y. Notes, Deut. 10:17. Matt. 22:15—22, v. 16.) yet in private life, he may send a present to what friend he pleases, or dispense his alms to what poor persons he chooses, without giving others a ground for charging him with "respect of persons." (Note, Matt. 20:1—16, v. 15.) If God had accepted a man's worship because he was a Jew, and rejected that of another man, of exactly the same dispositions and character, because he was a Gentile; there would have been some reason to assert that he was "a respecter of persons:" but if he had favoured a proud, wicked, or hypocritical Jew, merely on account of his circumcision, or relation to Abraham; and rejected a humble, pious, believing, sincere worshipper, because of his uncircumcision, or his Gentile extraction; there would have been an evident ground for the charge. Yet the Jews in general carried their ideas of God's special favour to their nation, so far as fully to involve these consequences. It does not however follow that God will accept from any man that service, which is destitute of spiritual good; or that any man will do what is spiritually good, without 'regenerating grace;' or that God is bound in justice to give his special grace to an unconverted man, because of his external decency of character, or formal services; or that he may not confer this unmerited favour on any one, as he sees good, without "respecting persons;" or that the fruits of grace can claim, or meet acceptance, on any other ground, than that of the covenant of mercy, through the righteousness and atonement of our divine Surety. In short, where the essence of true religion is found, God graciously accepts it without regarding names, forms, or sects. So that, "in every nation, he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted of him:" for this, when genuine, comprises the substance of true religion, and constitutes the evidence, though not the meritorious cause, of a man's acceptance; and, whatever may yet be wanting in his explicit knowledge and faith, will in due time be communicated. (Marg. Ref. z, a. Notes, Job 34:16—19. Gal. 2:6—10. 1 Pet. 1:17—22.)—'I think this text proves that God would sooner send an angel to direct pious and upright persons to the knowledge of the gospel, than suffer them to perish by ignorance of it. But so far from intimating that such persons may be found among those that reject Christianity, ... it determines nothing as to their existence in every nation.' Doddridge. (Notes, Rom. 2:7—16.) Does universal history, ancient and modern, bring to our knowledge one person who, without revelation, in some way or degree, was a humble penitent, a spiritual worshipper of God, a conscientious worker of righteousness, in his habitual conduct; in one word a Cornelius? If it do not, all advanced from this passage about virtuous heathens is wholly foreign to the purpose. Their virtue was not and is not good 'before God.'

V. 36—43. The apostle next proceeded to state the substance of the instruction which he was sent to communicate. This indeed would scarcely have been necessary, if Cornelius had been so "accepted" for his good works, as not to need the righteousness and atonement of Christ; or if, as numbers argue, every man might be saved by his own religion, if sincere in it. But his prayers for instruction, being accompanied by obedience and good fruits, according to his present light, were accepted, and in consequence, the only way of salvation was made known unto him, and his heart was prepared to welcome it. (Notes, 1,2. 11:4—18.)—Peter, in calling the attention of the company to his subject, observed that they had doubtless known something about the preaching of "Jesus of Nazareth," and the reports which had been cir-

44 ¶ While Peter yet spake these words, [z]the Holy Ghost fell on all them which heard the word.

45 And [a]they of the circumcision which believed, were astonished, as many as came with Peter, because that on [b]the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost.

46 For they heard them [c]speak with tongues, and magnify God. Then answered Peter, 47 Can [d]any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, which have received the Holy Ghost as well as we?

48 And [e]he commanded them to be baptized [f]in the name of the Lord. [g]Then prayed they him to tarry certain days.

culated concerning him; though their information had been imperfect and unfavourable. Now these reports, properly understood, contained that very instruction which God had sent him to deliver; even the word, which he had some time before sent to the Jews, preaching reconciliation to himself, and peace with each other, by this Jesus, who was the promised Messiah; the anointed Saviour and King of Israel; yea, "the Lord of all" men, whether Jews or Gentiles; of all creatures whether men or angels, and of all worlds, even of all things in heaven, earth, and hell; both in respect of his divine nature, as the incarnate Son of God, and as the Mediator between God and man, the Lawgiver, Governor, and Judge of all: for so the words, "this Person is Lord of all," evidently mean. (Marg. Ref. e. Notes, Matt. 28:18. Rom. 14:7—12. 1 Cor. 15:45—49. Eph. 1:15—23. 2:14—22. Phil. 2:9—11. 1 Pet. 3:21,22.) The apostle declared, that he came to confirm that doctrine which they knew had been published throughout all Judea; though it was first more statedly preached in Galilee, after John had prepared the way for it by his ministry and baptism. This doctrine implied, that God had "anointed Jesus with the Holy Spirit," in an evident manner, at his baptism, when he had declared him to be his "beloved Son in whom he was well pleased;" (Marg. Ref. f—i. Note, Matt. 3:16,17.) and had endued him, as Man, with that divine power, which he exercised "in going about doing good," and performing all kinds of miraculous cures; especially delivering those who were oppressed by evil spirits, as an emblem of his rescuing sinners from the yoke and service of Satan: for God was evidently with him, as appeared by the authority and beneficence of his miracles. (Marg. Ref. k—m. Notes, Luke 4:16—19. John 3:1,2. 5:31 —38.) To this, Peter and the other apostles were appointed to bear witness; as they had been his constant attendants, and the spectators of these interesting scenes: till at length, the Jewish rulers, hating the holy doctrine, and envying the reputation of Jesus, had seized him, and condemned him to death as a deceiver; and had procured the execution of their sentence from Pilate: so that he had been most cruelly and ignominiously crucified as a malefactor. (Marg. Ref. n, o. Notes, 2:22—24. 3:12—16. 4:5—12.) But, though it had pleased God, for most wise and gracious purposes, to permit their malice to proceed thus far; he had yet raised him from the dead, and "shown him openly" after his resurrection: not indeed to all the people, whose conduct had rendered them unworthy of such a favour; neither would that method have been so convincing and satisfactory to all those, in every age and nation, who were concerned in this event; (Note, John 20:24—29, latter part;) but to a competent number of witnesses, whom he had before chosen for that purpose; even to the twelve apostles, and many others, who had seen, conversed, eaten, and drunk with him, after he arose from the dead. (Marg. Ref. p—r. Notes, Luke 24:36—43. John 21:1—14.) He had also commanded them to preach these things to mankind: and to assure them, that he, who was then proposed to them as a Saviour, was ordained by God, to be the Judge of those who should at the last day be found living on earth, and of the innumerable multitudes which would then be raised from the dead. (Marg. Ref. s, t. Note, 17:30,31.)—These things indeed were no other than what had been predicted in the Scriptures, with which Cornelius and his friends were become in some measure acquainted: and in due time they would see that the several particulars relating to the person, character, miracles, doctrine, life, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus, were an exact accomplishment of ancient prophecies; and that all the prophets, in one way or other, bore witness to him, and directed mankind to expect acceptance through his righteousness and sacrifice: so that whosoever of any nation or description believed in him, should receive a free and complete remission of all his sins. (Marg. Ref. u—v. Notes, 3:24—26. Luke 24:25—31,44—49. John 5:39—44. Rev. 19:9,10.) This should be considered as only an abstract of Peter's discourse; and as he was interrupted in it by the descent of the Holy Spirit, we need not wonder, that various points of Christian doctrine are not explicitly stated in it; for they were left to be communicated afterwards, and by degrees. (Notes, 7:1—8,51—53. Matt. 28:19,20, v. 20.)

V. 44—48. (Note, 11:4—17.) It does not appear that the descent of the Holy Spirit, on this occasion, was accompanied by the same circumstances as on the day of Pentecost: but the effects were evident, and similar to those which were then produced. (Notes, 2:2—4.) The Gentile converts were immediately enabled to speak in languages which they had not previously learned; and to magnify God, and celebrate, with adoring gratitude, the glory displayed in the work of redemption. (Marg. Ref. z—c.) As they were thus undeniably baptized with the Holy Spirit, poured out upon them; not only by his illuminating, sanctifying, and comforting influences, but by his miraculous gifts also; Peter justly concluded, that it would be unreasonable to refuse them the baptism of water: and when none of his companions could say any thing against it, he ordered them to be baptized, by some of those who attended him. (Marg. Ref. d—f. Notes, 1:4—8. Matt. 3:11,12.)—Forbid water, &c. (47) 'These words contain a plain and convincing demonstration of the falsehood of the Quaker's doctrine, that water-baptism is unnecessary to them who have received the inward baptism of the Spirit: since the apostle here not only declares, that water-baptism ought therefore to be administered to these persons, because they had already been baptized with the Holy Ghost; but also commands them to be baptized on that account.' Whithy—It was not necessary for the sacred historian, on such occasions, to repeat the appointed form of Christian baptism; and therefore the special confession of Jesus, as the Messiah, the Son of God, is alone noticed. But there seems no ground to doubt, that the form also was adhered to. Some learned men conjecture, that when Jews, who had before believed in the Father and in the Holy Spirit, were baptized, it was only in the name of the Son: but that the Gentile converts were baptized "into the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit." This, however, is merely conjecture, and very improbable: for not the least trace of it is found in Scripture; nor any difference marked, between the form of baptizing Jewish and Gentile converts. It is rather taken for granted, that the apostles and primitive teachers, adhered to the instruction of their Lord just before his ascension; and it was therefore needless to mention that circumstance in the narrative. (Note, Matt. 28:19,20, v. 19. —It is not said that the brethren who accompanied Peter were pastors; but it is probable, that some of them were. There had been Christians at Joppa for a considerable time: and either those who first collected a church in that city, appointed pastors; or Peter, when he went thither, "set in order this which was wanting." (Note, Tit. 1:5—9.) Now it is most natural to suppose, that on so interesting an occasion, Peter would take with him, as witnesses, some of the pastors of the church, and not exclusively private Christians. Ananias is not said to have been a minister, or pastor; yet it can scarcely be doubted that he was.—The apostle, however, seems to have devolved the service of baptizing the Gentile converts on his attendants; perhaps for the same reasons which the apostle Paul assigned, on an occasion in some respects similar. (Notes, John 4:1—4. 1 Cor. 1:10—19.)—To tarry, &c. (48) It cannot be supposed, but that Peter lived with these converted Gentiles, according to their usual habits, as to eating, and other things of that nature, after all which had preceded his going among them, without any special regard to the ceremonial law. This may be of use, if recollected, in forming our judgment on some other portions of this history. (Notes, 21:17—26. 1 Cor. 9:19—23. Gal. 2: 11—16. 4:12—16.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. Pure and undefiled religion is sometimes found, where it might least have been expected: (P. O. Matt. 8:5 —13.) and "the vessels of mercy" are often brought acquainted with God, by means of which at the time they know not the consequence, and which perhaps thwart their inclinations, and disappoint their schemes of future life.—"The saving grace of God teaches" men to "worship him

He satisfies them, by relating the whole transaction; and they "glorify God, who had given to the Gentiles repentance unto life," 4—18. with reverence and godly fear," to serve him conscientiously, to unite justice and charity, and to pray with constancy and perseverance. It leads men to order their households in the fear of God; and commonly they become instrumental to the good of those around them. (P. O. Gen. 18:16—22. Josh. 24:14—33.) This Roman soldier was more like "a son of Abraham," even before he became a Christian, than most of that patriarch's lineal descendants were; and doubtless he will rise up in judgment against numbers of nominal Christians, and even professors of evangelical truth. Yet all this diligence, liberality, equity, piety, and self-denial, could not have saved him, without the atonement of Christ: even he must be accepted, and admitted into heaven, in the same way with Saul the persecutor, with the converted jailor, and the thief upon the cross; "that no flesh should glory in the presence of God." What then will become of those who, without one tenth of the external appearance of his piety and charity, presume that they shall go to heaven on the score of their good works, and reject the way of salvation by faith in Jesus Christ? But where these things are genuine, they are always attended with a humble, teachable, and inquiring disposition: and those who practise what they know, without being proud of it, or trusting to it, and who at the same time wait upon God for further teaching, by faith and prayer, shall never perish for want of instruction. (Note, John 7:14—17.) Should the Lord create such a disposition in the heart of an inhabitant of China, Japan, or the unexplored parts of Africa; he would sooner send an angel from heaven, or a minister from the uttermost part of the earth, to show him the way of salvation, than leave him destitute of that knowledge, for which he longs and prays without ceasing. The alms and supplications of such persons spring from right principles and motives, and go "up as a memorial before God;" not to merit his favour, but to plead with him to fulfil his gracious promises.—The sublime subjects, which pertain to redemption through the blood of the Son of God, seem more proper for the tongues of angels to proclaim, than for us poor worms of the earth. Doubtless, in many respects, they could preach them unspeakably better: yet our humiliating and thankful experience may balance something on the other side. In that case, however, it would not be so evident, that "the excellency of the power," which makes the word successful, is wholly "of God;" nor would their presence and language be so suited to man's weakness, or so conducive to his comfort.—The Lord knows where, and about what, his servants are employed; and when he has further work for them, he will surely by one means or other show it to them.—Implicit obedience tends to increasing light and comfort: and pious servants or attendants are a great blessing, which we should seek from God, use proper means to obtain, and express a proper value for when they are granted to us.

V. 9—23. The thoughts and ways of the Lord are far above our's: the best of men are seldom entirely free from some remaining prejudices; even those, who were infallibly guided by the Holy Spirit, to declare the doctrine of Christ to mankind, were gradually let into the secret designs of God, and delivered from their mistakes and prejudices, as it became needful. How absurdly then do they act, who aim and expect to put the new convert, at once, into full possession of that whole system, which perhaps they themselves have been learning for years!—The Lord may command his servants, without assigning his reasons: but he generally satisfies them, about the propriety of those services to which he calls them; and their constancy and fervency in prayer very much conduce to it. (Note, John 15:12—16.)—When pious persons conscientiously deny themselves, in obedience to what they deem the command of God, without self-righteousness or spiritual pride; their conduct may evidence their sincerity, and exhibit to others a very useful example; even should it appear that they were mistaken in their scruples: and in this view, the apostle's readiness to endure hunger rather than eat forbidden food, and his scrupulous exactness in this respect, during his whole past life, convey to us important and humiliating instructions. (Notes, Dan. 1:8—16. P. O. 8—20.)—The company of those who are collected together into the church of God, and secured by the covenant of grace, are previously of very different characters and dispositions; yet all alike estranged from God and holiness. But when they are truly converted, they become all of "one mind and judgment," in the grand concerns of religion: they have the same faith, hope, and love, and the same motives and distinguishing principles; and their several natural dispositions, being corrected, regulated, and moderated by sanctifying grace, render them more qualified in different ways to serve the common cause of the gospel. (P. O. Is. 11:1—9.) Let us then learn "not to call those common" whom God has cleansed, or to despise those whom he has received; and not to neglect or despair of those whom he may yet call to the knowledge of himself.—If we diligently endeavour to discover the meaning of his word; the dispensations of his providence, and our own experience, will often throw light upon it; and, without any immediate revelation, we shall be directed and encouraged to proceed in the path of duty, "nothing doubting." But how strong must prejudice be, when so many divine monitions were requisite, to induce an apostle to attend on a man of fair character and good report, who by the warning of an angel had sent for him, that he might receive the instructions of life from his lips!

V. 24—43. Those who love the truth will desire to bring their friends, and especially their relations, acquainted with it, and will diligently use their influence with them for that purpose.—While numbers despise the servants of God, some will honour them in an improper manner: and it becomes them decidedly to refuse undue and excessive respect; for humility and modesty are the peculiar ornaments of piety.—Alas! how seldom are we called to speak to auditories, however small, in which it may be said, that "they are all present in the sight of God, to hear all things that are commanded us of God!"—Whatever men may assert or object, it will be found "that God is no respecter of persons:" and if any do not see the consistency of this with evangelical truth, or the sovereignty of his dispensations; let them learn to admit, that it is wholly owing to their narrow capacities, and the proud and carnal self-love of their own hearts. For God does not limit his conduct by the rules, or according to the systems of bigoted or prejudiced persons: he gives grace to whom he pleases, and as he sees best; and the fruits of that grace always meet with his acceptance, through the mercy of the covenant, and the merits of the great Mediator. When he begins, he will carry on his work: and by whatever way he leads sinners to heaven, they will be prepared to join the chorus of the redeemed, in singing "salvation to God and the Lamb." That preventing grace, which leads men to fervent prayer and conscientious obedience, is not given to supersede the gospel, but to render men willing to embrace it. The minister of Christ must therefore declare to sinners of every character, that word which God has sent to men, "preaching peace by Jesus Christ," "the Prince of peace" and "the Lord of all;" by whom alone they can be saved, and to whom they must at length submit, in one way or other. Many serious inquirers hear reports of this doctrine; but these come to them, so distorted and misrepresented, that they are for a long time set against it: and they are astonished, when, in answer to their prayers, the Lord leads them to hear and receive his truth, from the very persons against whom they have been so greatly prejudiced; and when they find their doctrine so different in its nature and tendency from what they supposed, and so exactly suited to their wants and desires.—While we consider the effects of our Redeemer's immeasurable unction by the Holy Spirit; let us endeavour to copy his example, being unwearied in doing good, and in promoting the deliverance of our fellow-sinners from the oppression of Satan, by all the means which we can devise: thus it will appear that "God is with us," whatever men may say of us or do to us.—Receiving the testimony of apostles and prophets to the efficacy of his sacrifice, and the free remission of our sins through faith in his name: let us daily prepare to meet him, as the constituted Judge of the living and of the dead; and "be diligent to be found of him in peace without spot and blameless." (Note, 2 Pet. 3:14—16. P. O. 14—18.)

V. 44—48. When we endeavour to mix faith with the word of God, and to yield obedience to it; we may expect to be more fully illuminated, sanctified, and comforted, by the gift of the Holy Spirit: that, through "the love of God" being "shed abroad in our hearts," we may use our tongues to celebrate his praises. This inward baptism of the Spirit is especially to be valued; yet outward ordinances should not be neglected: and those who conclude that they have no occasion for the external signs, because they have received the internal grace of the covenant, speak and act in a very unscriptural manner, and give reason for suspecting that they deceive themselves: yet if we have both the outward sign and the inward and spiritual grace,' it is not of much importance, in what order we have received them. Those who have learned and experienced the things of God, will desire the further company of his ministers, to build them up in their most holy faith.—But surely, we sinners of the Gentiles should read this chapter with peculiar gratitude and admiring praise: thus the partition-wall was broken down, the law of ordinances that was against us was abolished, the door of mercy was opened to us; that we might become fellow-heirs with the ancient people of God, in all the blessings of his covenant and salvation. (Notes, and P. O. Eph. 2:11—22.) May the Lord speedily recall the Jews into the church, and bring in "the fulness of the Gentiles;" that "his name may be hallowed," his kingdom established, and "his will done," throughout the whole earth, as it is by all the angels and saints in heaven!

NOTES.—CHAP. XI. V. 1—3. The dissatisfaction of the believers, who "were of the circumcision," when they heard of Cornelius's conversion, and Peter's conduct respecting him, emphatically illustrates the degree in which the Jews were prejudiced against the Gentiles, even when they appeared to worship God alone, and were exemplary in their general conduct; unless they were circumcised, and became obedient to the Mosaic law. If the believers from among the Jews, were so alarmed and offended at Peter, for eating, on such an occasion, with persons of so good a report as Cornelius and his friends; what must have have been the thoughts of the Jews in general, concerning the state of the idolatrous and licentious Gentiles? (Note, 10:34,35.)—It is not said that "the apostles contended" with Peter on this account: yet, if the general opinion had not been unfavourable to his conduct, none would have publicly called him to an account, or have warmly contested the point with him.—This fact is likewise an unanswerable proof, that the primitive church had no idea of Peter's supremacy and infallibility: indeed, the persons concerned by no means rendered due respect to his apostolical authority.

V. 4—17. Peter, when thus called upon, pleaded no exemptions; but with a becoming candour and frankness, stated the whole transaction to his brethren, and thus vindicated what he had done, beyond all possibility of objection. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 10:9—48.)—Not so, &c. (8) It has been argued from this, that only unclean animals were seen in this vision: but that is not determined in the text; and the apostle's objection may have been made against the general proposal to him, of slaying and eating whatever animal he chose. (Note, 10:9—16, v. 14.)—Thou, &c. (14) This is far more full and explicit than the narrative in the preceding chapter: Cornelius must himself be saved, not by his prayers and alms, his piety and equity and charity; but by the words which Peter would speak to him, and by faith in those words; and thus also salvation would come to his family. (Notes, 2:37—40. 16:13—15,29—34. Gen. 17:7,8. Jer. 32:39—41. Luke 19:1—10. 1 Cor. 7:10—14.)—Baptized, &c. V. 18. The clear discovery of the express purpose of God, which appeared in all the circumstances of the transaction, overpowered the prejudices of the objectors; and they could not but admire and adore his grace, which had opened a way even to the Gentiles to obtain eternal life, when they repented, and forsook idolatry and wickedness, and "turned to God" and his worship and service; and which had given to some of them "repentance unto life." (Marg. Ref. Notes, 10:24—26. 15:7—11.)—It may hence be inferred, that even the disciples did not before consider the professed repentance of a Gentile, however attended with "works meet for repentance," to be acceptable with God, unless it led him unreservedly to embrace the religion of the Jews. This proves, that many things, which learned men have stated concerning the proselytes of the gate, and their privileges, rather show what ought to have been the case, than what it really was.—Dr. Whitby has here a long note, to evince, that the language of this verse and of similar passages, which state, that repentance and faith are the gift of God, does not imply that they are not conditional, and that they give encouragement to those alone who perform the conditions; in which important truths are contained, but blended, as it appears to me, with much error.—That repentance and faith, and every kind of obedience, are the duties of every man; that means should be used, by such as desire to perform these duties; and that none receive the gift and grant of God, who live and die in the neglect of the appointed means of grace; are propositions not in the least to be contested. But this learned divine and many others, seem to forget, that "the heart of stone," "the uncircumcised heart," "the carnal mind which is enmity against God," effectually prevents every man from doing these duties, or properly using those means, or even heartily desiring spiritual blessings, till it be removed by regeneration. (Notes, 7:51—53. Deut. 30:1—10. Jer. 4:3,4. Ez. 11:19—20. 36:25—27. Rom. 8:5—9. Eph. 2:4—10. Phil. 2:12,13.) Hence it is "God, who worketh in us to will," as well as to do. 'We have no power to do good works, pleasant and acceptable to God, without the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will, and working with us when we have that good will.' Art. x.—'They blessed God, . . . that he had afforded the same mercy to the Gentiles, as to the Jews, that if they will return and amend, and receive Christ, they shall be saved; and that he had given him the grace to do so.' Hammond.—'He has not only made them the overtures of it; but has graciously wrought it in some of their hearts.' Doddridge.—The inseparable connexion of repentance and eternal life should not pass unnoticed, in this place. V. 19—21. (Marg. Ref. l—s.) The words here translated "preaching," do not necessarily imply a public and authoritative proclamation. (Notes, 8:4,32—35.) "Speaking the word to none, but unto the Jews only." "They spake unto the Grecians, declaring the glad tidings concerning the Lord Jesus." 'As in this place the Hellenists are opposed to the Jews; and as the church of Antioch was, as it were, a new Jerusalem for the Gentiles; it appears that, under this term, those were included, ... who had so far profited by their acquaintance with the dispersed Jews, that, condemning idolatry, they acknowledged God, who had spoken by Moses and the prophets, though they remained uncircumcised; of which description Cornelius was, as it is evident from the preceding history.' Beza.—'Instead of Ἑλληνιστας, Hellenists, the Alexandrian manuscript, which is favoured by the Syriac and some other ancient versions, reads Ἑλληνας, Greeks; which common sense would require us to adopt, even if it were not supported by the authority of any manuscript at all. For as the Hellenists were Jews, there would, on the received reading, be no opposition between the conduct of these preachers, and those mentioned in the preceding verse. Here undoubtedly we have the first account of preaching the gospel to the idolatrous Gentiles: for it is certain there is nothing in the word Ἑλληνας, to limit it to such as were worshippers of the true God. . . . As the Greeks were the most celebrated of the Gentile nations near Judea, the Jews called all the Gentiles by that general name. (Rom. 10:12. Gal. 3:28. Col. 3:11.)' Doddridge.—It would, in my mind, be far preferable to leave the point undecided, or even to adopt Beza's exposition; than to alter the text, 'without the authority of any manuscript:' for who can say, how far men may proceed in altering the Scriptures by conjectural criticisms, pleading at the same time, that 'common sense requires it?' This, however, is not here the case, for there is good ground to conclude, that Greeks is the genuine reading.—The distance of Antioch and Cyprus from Jerusalem renders it probable, that no worshippers of God, according to the law, except "Grecians," or Jews using the Greek and not the Hebrew or Syriac language, and reading the Greek translation of the Scriptures in their synagogues, resided in those parts: (Note, 6:1.) and if there were synagogues of Jews, who used the Hebrew or Syraic, no good reason can be assigned, why the word of God should be spoken to them only, and not to their brethren, who differed from them in nothing but language. It is therefore highly probable, that the persons spoken of, for a considerable time addressed none but Jews and circumcised proselytes: but that at length, the report of Cornelius's conversion having reached Antioch, which cannot be shown to have been even improbable; some of them were encouraged to preach to uncircumcised persons also: and their great success, by the immediate power of the Lord, accompanying the word, gave a divine sanction to their proceedings. Upon the whole, it is most likely, that at Antioch, and about this time, the gospel was first preached to idolatrous Gentiles.—Was not the extraordinary success of the word, and the holy effects which followed by "the hand of the Lord," as real a sanction both to the mission of the preachers and to their conduct in preaching to the Gentiles, as outward miracles would have been?—Hand, &c. (21) (Marg. Ref. t.) No miracles are mentioned, and the inward power of divine grace, teaching, inclining, and aiding the hearers to believe, seems exclusively meant.—Believed, &c. *Marg. V. 22. (Marg. Ref.) 'The apostles do not rashly condemn the extraordinary vocation, but judge of it by its effects.' Beza. Barnabas was sent by the apostles, as it may be supposed, to examine on the spot into the nature and effects of that success which had attended the gospel at Antioch; and to set in order such things as related to the appointment of pastors, and the administration of sacred ordinances to the new converts; perhaps to baptize them, and so "add them to the church." (24. Note, 8:14—17

V. 23, 24. Barnabas "saw the grace of God," in its happy effects on the conduct and spirit of these converts; and this greatly rejoiced his benevolent mind. (Marg. Ref. a. Notes Mark 2:3—12, v. 5. 1 Thes. 1:1—4, vv. 3,4.) But he was aware that their faith would be assaulted by manifold temptations and persecutions; and that those who had been Gentiles would be discouraged, through the prejudices of their Jewish brethren; he therefore exhorted, encouraged, and besought them, by every argument and motive which he could devise "to cleave to the Lord" Jesus, or abide with him, by a continued exercise of faith, a bold profession of his name, and implicit obedience to his commandments: whatever they might be called to renounce or suffer for his sake. (Marg. Ref. b—d. Notes, 14:21—23. John 8:30—36. 15:3—11.) For "he was a good man," a person of remarkable affection, philanthropy, and genuine candour; as well as eminent for the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, and the exercise of a vigorous faith in the midst of danger and persecution. So that, through his labours and those of the other teachers, great accessions were made to the number of Christians at Antioch; and a flourishing church was planted there, from which preachers were afterwards sent forth to evangelize the nations. V. 25, 26. As so large and encouraging a sphere of usefulness was unexpectedly open, in this great and populous city, Barnabas went from thence to Tarsus, that he might procure the assistance of Saul: (Note, 9:23—30.) and, having prevailed with him to accompany him, they laboured together at Antioch for a whole year, in further instructing the numerous converts, and in reducing the church to order and regularity, as well as in preaching the gospel to the unconverted inhabitants. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. i.)—Nothing is recorded of the apostle's success at Tarsus. (Note, Matt. 13: 54—58.) There were, however, churches in Cilicia. (Note, 15:36—41.)—Were called Christians. (26) "It came to pass that they" (Paul and Barnabas) "called the disciples Christians." This is indisputably the natural construction of the verse.—But the word implies that this was done by divine revelation: for it has generally this signification in the New Testament, and is rendered "warned from God" or "warned of God," even when there is no word for God in the Greek. 'The believing Jews and Gentiles, being made one church, that the name of Jew and heathen might no more continue the distance that was between them, this new name was given to them both: as some conceive according to the prophecy mentioned, Is. 65:15.' Whitby. Their enemies had hitherto called them Nazarenes, or Galileans: and if they had devised some other opprobrious name, they would, probably, have derived it from the word Jesus, rather than from Christ, or the Messiah, which they would never allow the crucified Nazarene to be. On the other hand, the disciples had called each other "brethren," "believers," and "saints," which names were not sufficiently distinguishing: but the word Christian, aptly denoted their reliance on that anointed Prince and Saviour, who was generally rejected with disdain by Jews and Gentiles: it also implied, that they were partakers of an unction by the Holy Spirit. Doubtless it was afterwards used as a term of reproach by their persecutors, though it was so honourable in its meaning and original. At present it is applied promiscuously to so vast and heterogeneous a multitude, that it scarcely implies either honour or reproach and those who seriously profess to believe and obey Christ are generally distinguished by other names, whether they are spoken of with respect, or in derision. (Marg. Ref. k. Note, 1 Pet. 4:12—16.)

It came to pass, that ... the disciples were called Christians. (26) Εγενετο αυτους ... χρηματισαι ... τους μαθητας Χριστιανους.—Χρηματισαι is infinitive active, and needs another verb to govern it, and an accusative case after it. Χρηματιζω

CHAPTER XII.

King Herod persecutes the church; kills James, the brother of John; and imprisons Peter, 1—4; who, in answer to unceasing prayer, is delivered out of prison by an angel, 5—17. Herod puts the keepers to death; and leaving Jerusalem goes to Cesarea, 18, 19. Proudly receiving the honour due to God alone, he is smitten by an angel, and dies miserably, 20—23. The word of God prospers, 24. Barnabas and Saul return to Antioch, 25.

NOW, about that time, Herod the king [t]stretched forth his hands [u]to vex certain of the church.

V. 27—30. These prophets were evidently endowed by the Holy Spirit with the power of foretelling future events; and were a superior order of extraordinary ministers, however the word may sometimes be used. (Marg. Ref. l. Note, 21:7—14.)—The scarcity predicted by Agabus was to extend "throughout all the world," as the Roman empire was ostentatiously called. (Note, Luke 2:1.) Some indeed would explain it of the land of Judea and Galilee: but the expression is incapable of that meaning: and the famine might be very general, and severely felt in the various provinces of the empire; though some places might be less straitened than others.—Eusebius saith of this famine, that it oppressed almost the whole empire; and that it was recorded by historians most averse to our religion; viz. by Suetonius, in the Life of Claudius, who saith, it happened (ob assiduus sterilitates) through a long barrenness. Josephus saith that it raged so much in Judea, ... that many perished for want of victuals: and Dion Cassius, that it was a very great famine.' Whithy. The believers at Antioch, which was a rich and trading city, were more affluent than those in Judea; who had also impoverished themselves, by selling their estates after the day of Pentecost. For these reasons, and probably because the Gentile converts wished to conciliate the affections of their Jewish brethren; they determined to make a collection, in proportion to their gain in trade, or from their estates, and to send a sum of money to relieve the poor Christians in Judea. (Marg. Ref. p, q. Notes, Rom. 15:22—29. 1 Cor. 16:1,2.) Barnabas and Saul were intrusted to carry these first-fruits of the faith and love of the Gentile converts to Jerusalem: and as, probably, most of the apostles were absent, preaching the gospel in other places, they delivered the money to the "elders," that they might intrust it to the deacons to be distributed. This is the first time "elders" are mentioned in the church of Christ; but we shall have more favourable opportunities of considering several questions relative to their office: (Note, 20:17.) without doubt they were pastors of the Christian church; and as both Peter and John call themselves Elders, (1 Pet. 5:1,2. 2 John 1.) it is not clear that the apostles were not included. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—18. The imperfection of human nature, even in its best estate, appears, when pious persons are offended and grieved at those things which should excite in them the most lively joy and gratitude. Sometimes true believers are displeased to hear, even of the word of God being preached and received, because the peculiarities of their own church, sect, or system, have not been adhered to: and they are ready to find fault with the Lord's plan of bringing sinners to repentance, and faith in Christ, and with those who execute it; because their own plan and prejudices have been broken in upon. (Notes, Jon. 4:1—4. Mark 9:38—40. Luke 9:46—50, v. 50.) Hence it is, that the zealous servant of God may expect to be censured, on account of those very things in which his Master has peculiarly prospered him, and by those whom he most esteems and loves! We should, however, meekly bear with the infirmities of our brethren: and, instead of taking offence, or answering with warmth, we ought candidly to explain our motives, and show the nature of our proceedings, in order to satisfy and conciliate their minds.—It behooves every one to remember who and what he is: and while men are very zealous for their own regulations, they should take care, that they do not "withstand God," or prescribe other terms of admission among them, than he has appointed for admission into his church: lest they should reject and grieve those who have believed in Christ, and received the gift and the baptism of the Holy Spirit, even as they have.—Men of piety and candour, though they have been prejudiced, will be satisfied with a proper answer, and a sufficient explanation and reason: and those who love the Lord will glorify him, when they are certified that he "hath given repentance unto life," even to the most abject of their fellow-sinners. (Notes, and P. O. Luke 15:1—10,25—32.)

V. 19—30. When the Lord Jesus is preached in simplicity, and according to the Scripture; his power will attend the word to give it success: and when sinners are brought "to believe, and turn unto the Lord;" "good men," who are "full of faith and of the Holy Ghost," will discern, admire, and rejoice in the grace of God bestowed upon them; and exhort all, who profess the gospel, "to cleave to the Lord" Jesus "with purpose of heart," knowing how many efforts Satan and his servants will employ to draw them aside. Where a prospect of great usefulness appears, they will bestow pains to procure the assistance of the most able and zealous ministers, though themselves should be thus eclipsed: and while such men proceed with one heart in the work, believers will be encouraged in assembling together, in order to their edification and establishment.—We, at this day, are called by the name given to these ancient disciples: may we be anointed with the same Spirit, and walk in their steps! A Christian is a member of Christ's mystical body, a temple of the Holy Spirit, an adopted child of God, an anointed king and priest unto him, and an heir of everlasting glory. (Note, 1 John 2: 20—25.) May we be ambitious of these honours, which belong to all his saints! may we "walk worthy of this vocation, wherewith we are called!" and may 'all, who call themselves Christians, be led into the way of truth, and hold the faith, in unity of spirit, in the bond of peace, and in righteousness of life!' Such Christians will sympathize with their brethren in all their afflictions: the various dispensations of Providence will give them opportunity of showing their love, by distributing according to their ability to "the necessity of the saints:" thus God will be glorified, the harmony among believers promoted, the faith and hope of the poor encouraged, their prayers and praises excited: and fruit brought forth, which will abound to the account of those by whom it is produced. (Note, and P. O. 2 Cor. 9:8—15.) The wisdom of this world indeed would earnestly plead, in the prospect of a famine, the propriety of hoarding for ourselves and families against the emergency; and doubtless frugality, as distinguished from avarice, is not only prudent, but an incumbent duty: yet "the wisdom from above" will teach us, in such circumstances especially, to "lend to the LORD" by giving liberally to his needy servants, and to trust him, when the time comes, to provide for us and our's, in his own manner and measure. (Notes, and P. O. 2:41—47. Note, Jam. 3:17, 18.)

NOTES.—CHAP. XII. V. 1—4. This Herod, surnamed Agrippa, was grandson to Herod the Great, by Aristobulus; nephew to Herod Antipas, who slew John the Baptist; brother to Herodias his incestuous paramour; and father to king Agrippa, of whom we shall read hereafter. (Notes, 25:13—27. 26: Matt. 14:1—5.) The emperor Caligula made him tetrarch of Galilee; and Claudius afterwards made him king of Judea, because he had been serviceable to him in obtaining the empire. Judea had been before, and was again soon after, under the dominion of a Roman governor. Herod being invested with his new dignity, endeavoured by all means to ingratiate himself with the Jews: and this probably combined with his hereditary enmity to the gospel, in exciting him to persecute the church. He seems to have harassed the Christians for some time, before he attacked the apostles: but at length he seized on James, the son of Zebedee, and immediately ordered him to be beheaded. (Marg. Ref. a—c.) Thus was he baptized with the baptism of his Lord, as it had been predicted; (Note, Matt. 20:20—23, v. 23.) and received the crown of martyrdom before any of the other apostles. As Herod found that the Jews were much pleased with this measure, he apprehended Peter also; (Marg. Ref. d, e. Notes, 24:24—27. 25:9—11.) and probably he intended to put the other apostles to death, when he could get them into his power: but, as the passover and the feast of unleavened bread were then celebrated, he meant to defer his proceedings against Peter till these solemnities were over. (Marg. Ref. f—i. Note, Matt. 26:3—5.) He therefore committed him to sixteen soldiers, who were appointed to guard him in prison, night and day, four at a time by rotation; intending as soon as the feast was ended, to gratify the Jews by his public execution. (Marg. Ref. h.)—Even if Easter were observed at that time, in the Christian church, of which nothing is mentioned in the sacred records; Herod would certainly pay no regard to it: it is therefore surprising, that the venerable translators of the Bible should have used that word, instead of "the passover," in this connexion!—This Herod 'was a great zealot for the Mosaic law, dwelt much at Jerusalem, and was fond of all opportunities of obliging the Jews. ... This early execution of one of the apostles, ... would illustrate the courage of the rest in going on with their

2 And he killed [b]James, the brother of John, [c]with the sword.

3 And because [d]he saw it pleased the Jews, [e]he proceeded further to take Peter also. [f]Then were the days of unleavened bread.

4 And when he had apprehended him, [g]he put him in prison, [h]and delivered him to four quaternions of soldiers to keep him; [i]intending after Easter to bring him forth to the people.

5 Peter therefore was kept in prison; but [k]prayer was [k]made without ceasing of the church unto God for him.

6 And when Herod would have brought him forth, [l]the same night Peter was sleeping between two soldiers, [m]bound with two chains: [n]and the keepers before the door kept the prison.

7 And, behold, [o]the angel of the Lord came upon him, [p]and a light shined in the prison: and he smote Peter on the side, and raised him up, saying, [q]Arise up quickly. [r]And his chains fell off from his hands.

8 And the angel said unto him, Gird thyself, and bind on thy sandals: and so he did. And he saith unto him, Cast thy garment about thee, and follow me.

9 And [s]he went out, and followed him; [t]and wist not that it was true which was done by the angel: but thought he saw a vision.

10 When they were past [u]the first and the second ward, they came unto the iron gate that leadeth unto the city; [x]which opened to them of his own accord: and they went out, and passed on through one street; and forthwith the ange departed from him.

11 And when Peter [y]was come to himself, he said, Now [z]I know of a surety, [a]that the Lord hath sent his angel, [b]and hath delivered me out of the hand of Herod, and from [c]all the expectation of the people of the Jews.

12 And when he had considered the thing, [d]he came to the house of Mary the mother of [e]John, whose surname was Mark; [f]where many were gathered together praying.

13 And as Peter [g]knocked at the door of the gate, a damsel came to [h]hearken, named Rhoda.

14 And when she knew Peter's voice, [h]she opened not the gate for gladness, but ran in, and told how Peter stood before the gate.

15 And they said unto her, [i]Thou art mad. But she constantly affirmed that it was even so. Then said they, [k]It is his angel.

16 But Peter continued knocking: and when they had opened the door, and saw him, they were astonished.

17 But he, [l]beckoning unto them with the hand to hold their peace, [m]declared unto them how the Lord had brought him out of the prison. And he said, Go show these things unto [n]James, and to the brethren. [o]And he departed, and went into another place. [Practical Observations.]

V. 5—11. The time of Peter's imprisonment gave the church an opportunity, not of concerting measures for his rescue, but of pouring out their fervent prayers for the preservation of his useful life. Probably they met together in different places for that purpose; and one company succeeding to another, there was literally no intermission of their prayers for him, day or night. Yet he was free from anxiety about the event: and the night before his intended execution, while others were earnestly praying for his life, he went to sleep with the utmost composure; though his posture must have been very uneasy, being chained with two chains, one on each hand, to the two soldiers between whom he lay. Even the strong light which attended the angel's entrance into the dungeon did not awake Peter; but when the angel, gently smiting his side, caused him to arise, he found his chains immediately loosed. (Marg. Ref. k—p.) Yet, neither the voice of the angel, the light in the prison, the falling of the chains, nor the preparation of Peter to depart, was noticed by the keepers, who were supernaturally thrown into a deep sleep. Nay, Peter himself supposed that he only saw a vision, as he had sometimes before done: and that it was not a reality. (Marg. Ref. q—t. Note, 10:9—16.) The wards or watches here mentioned seem to have included the stated guard of the prison, as well as the soldiers especially appointed to keep Peter: and these too were rendered insensible to the whole transaction. "The great iron gate" separated the environs of the prison from the city, and was doubtless barred in the strongest manner: yet it opened of its own accord. (Note, John 20:19—23.) When the angel had led Peter out of the reach of his keepers, and into a part of the city which he knew; he departed from him, and then he became sensible of the reality of his deliverance. (Marg. Ref. u, x. Note, 5:17—25.)—The people, as Peter well knew, eagerly longed to see him put to death, as a special gratification: notwithstanding the numerous miracles of mercy which had been performed by him! V. 12—17. This Mary was the sister of Barnabas. (Col. 4:10.)—It is probable, that it had been customary for some of the believers in Jerusalem to assemble at her house for religious worship; though it can scarcely be supposed that Peter knew that they were then joining in prayer for him. He, however, judged it best to go thither. But either their hopes were sunk very low, or they expected their prayers to be answered in some other way: for they were utterly indisposed to believe the report of the damsel, who informed them that he stood at the gate: and when she insisted upon it that it was Peter, for she knew his voice; rather than suppose that he had actually obtained his liberty, they concluded, "that it was his angel." (Marg. and Marg. Ref. d—k.) They seem to have spoken according to the notion, true or false, which has generally prevailed; that when people are near death, or have actually expired, a spirit or angel, in their exact form, and speaking with their voice, sometimes appears to their friends or acquaintance; which notion perhaps first arose from the opinion, that every man has his guardian angel appointed to take care of him. For to suppose, that they only meant that it was a messenger from him, is absurd; as a messenger could not speak with his well-known voice, though he might use his name.—When, however, Peter at length obtained admission, their transport of surprise was so great, that he could hardly obtain a hearing, when he desired to inform them, how the Lord had answered their prayers in his deliverance. (Marg. Ref. l, m. Notes, Job 9:14—21. Is. 65:24,25.) The other apostles seem to have been absent from Jerusalem: but James, the son of Alpheus, who wrote the epistle, was in some place of concealment in the neighbourhood; and Peter desired especially that he should be informed of his deliverance, for his encouragement. Having thus given proper directions to the disciples, he deemed it his duty to retire to some place of greater safety. (Marg. Ref. n, o.)—'It is utterly incredible, that he now went to Rome, and made an abode of twenty-five years, which the popish writers pretend.' Doddridge. It would be easy to multiply similar instances, in which the legends of the Romish church as much contradict the sacred history, as its traditions make void both the commandments and testimonies of God. 18 Now, as soon as it was day, [p]there was no small stir among the soldiers, what was become of Peter.

19 And when Herod had [q]sought for him, and found him not, [r]he examined the keepers, and [s]commanded that they should be put to death. And [t]he went down from Judea to Cesarea, and there abode.

20 ¶ And Herod [u]was highly displeased with them of [v]Tyre and Sidon: [x]but they came with one accord to him, and, having made Blastus [y]the king's chamberlain their friend, desired peace; [z]because their country was nourished by the king's country.

21 And upon a set day, Herod arrayed [a] royal apparel, sat upon his throne, and made an oration unto them.

22 And the people gave a shout, saying, [b]It is the voice of a god, and not of a man.

23 And immediately [c]the angel of the Lord smote him, [d]because he gave not God the glory: [e]and he was eaten of worms, and gave up the ghost.

24 ¶ But [f]the word of God grew and multiplied.

25 And [g]Barnabas and Saul returned from Jerusalem, when they had fulfilled their [‡]ministry, and took with them [f]John, whose surname was Mark.

V. 18, 19. The astonishment of the soldiers, when they found Peter was gone; their endeavours to throw the blame from themselves upon each other, and their dread of Herod's vindictive rage, may easily be conceived. Indeed they had cause to tremble: for that tyrant, exasperated at his disappointment, and unwilling it should be thought that Peter had been miraculously delivered, ordered them to immediate execution; alleging, no doubt, that Peter's escape was owing to their negligence and sleeping upon guard. (Marg. Ref. p—s. Note, Matt. 28:11—15.) Yet, it is highly probable, he himself perceived that Peter had been rescued in a supernatural manner, as all the apostles had before been; (Note, 5:17—25.) and we may suppose that this intimidated him, and induced him to suspend the persecution. Perhaps the chagrin, at being thus baffled, might hasten his departure to Cesarea, and influence him to continue there: though Josephus informs us, that he went thither to celebrate certain heathenish games, in honour of the Roman emperor.

That they should be put to death. (19) Απαχθηναι. 'Ad supplicium eos rapi jussit.' Schleusner.—24:7. Matt. 27:31. Luke 23:6.

V. 20—23. The Tyrians and Zidonians, being engaged in extensive commerce, depended almost entirely on Judea and Galilee for corn and other provisions. (Notes, 1 Kings 5:2—9. Ez. 27:13—25.) But Herod, having taken great offence at some part of their conduct, purposed to declare war against them; and by cutting off their supplies, he could soon have reduced them to distress. This consideration led them to pay court to the king's favourite, by whose good offices they renewed their peace with him; having made the needful concessions and submissions. (Marg. Ref. u—y.) This gave occasion to Herod, on an appointed day, to display his magnificence in a most ostentatious manner, of which Josephus has given a particular account: and, having from his throne delivered a speech, with much affectation of eloquence, and boastings of his equity and clemency; the people, either impressed with the splendour of the scene, and by the graces of his elocution, or courting his favour by the most abominable flattery, exclaimed that "it was the voice of a god, and not of a man!" (Marg. Ref. z.) Many heathen princes had received, nay, arrogated to themselves, divine honours: but it was far more horrible impiety in Herod, who was acquainted with the word and worship of the living God, to accept, and be pleased with, such idolatrous and sacrilegious adorations, without rebuking the blasphemy, and giving God the glory. Immediately, therefore, an angel smote him with an incurable disease; so that his bowels bred worms, which consumed them: and, after lying for some time, a most abject and loathsome spectacle, in excruciating pain, he died in the most degraded and wretched manner that can be conceived. (Marg. Ref. a—c.) Josephus ascribes his miserable end to the judgment of God on him, for the impiety here recorded, and introduces him, as owning it in very strong language: but he suppresses some circumstances, probably from regard to his family; and it was reserved for an inspired writer to inform us, that his disease arose from a stroke inflicted by an angel. (Notes, 2 Sam. 24:17. 2 Kings 19:35—37.)—It is, however, remarkable that the sacred historian does not represent the awful death of Herod, as a judgment on him for persecuting the church, though he had so inviting and so just an occasion of doing it; but assigns another cause of that event. This is a striking contrast to the usual practice of enthusiasts; who generally, without any adequate reason, take pleasure in representing all the calamities which befall those who even in a slight degree oppose them, as divine judgments on them for so doing. Many persecutors have ended their days by a similar disease, which has rendered them more loathsome while alive, than a putrid corpse can be: as well as filled them with the most intolerable pains. (Notes, Zech. 14:12—15. Matt. 2:19—23.)

V. 24. After the death of Herod, "the word of God" continued to grow and multiply; like seed, the produce of which is sown again the next year, and so on from year to year. (Notes, Is. 55:10,11. Matt. 13:18—23,36—43. John 15:12—16, v. 16.) Thus the believers, who sprang up from the first preaching of the word, still further diffused the knowledge of the gospel; and the cause of Christ got ground on every side, notwithstanding the opposition which was excited against it; and even by means of that opposition. (Marg. Ref. Note, 1—4.)

V. 25. (Note, 11:27—30. Probably Barnabas and Saul left Jerusalem, after a short continuance there, and perhaps before the beginning of this persecution: but the narrative, as it concerns them, is here resumed.—John Mark was nephew to Barnabas, and was taken by him and Saul, that he might be trained up for future usefulness; and, in the mean time, be serviceable to them in the multiplicity of their engagements. (Notes, 13:13—15. 15:36—41. Preface to the Gospel according to Mark.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—17. The enmity of the human heart against God, and the instigations of Satan, concur in exciting opposition to the church from time to time: and when wicked rulers find that the vexation and murder of pious Christians and zealous ministers are agreeable to their subjects, they are encouraged to proceed in that diabolical work. Thus, some of the saints, having finished their testimony, are removed to their rest: their pains are transient, and mitigated by divine consolations, and their subsequent felicity is unspeakable and eternal. (Notes, 7:54—60. Is. 57:1,2. Rev. 11:7—12.) But amidst the "Many devices, which are in the heart of man, the counsel of the LORD shall stand." (Notes, Ps. 76:10. Prov. 19:21.)—When time is given for prayer, and great numbers are excited to join in it, as with one heart and soul; it may be regarded as in indication, that God intends to grant their desires. (Note, Jam. 5:16—18.) He is reluctant to refuse the petitions of his children; and therefore he sometimes suddenly executes his purposes, without giving them the opportunity of interposing their requests to the contrary. But the lives of eminent saints are more desired by their brethren, than by themselves. (Note, 20:22—24.) A peaceful conscience, a lively hope, and the consolations of the Holy Spirit, produce the most entire composure in the immediate prospect of death, even in those very persons who have at other times been the most distracted with terrors on that account. (Note, Matt. 26:69—75.)—When the Lord sees good to deliver, all obstructions are insignificant: his angels gladly visit the dungeons or cells where his poor and afflicted children lie: even they can defeat or suspend all the powers of men; and they delight to minister comfort to the heirs of salvation. (Notes, Luke 16:22,23. Heb. 1:13,14.)—Whether we be waiting for deliverance from the bondage of sin, or for the termination of our trials and sorrows, while the Lord affords us his light, and puts forth his power, to excite our attention and expectation; we should implicitly follow his directions, and wait his will. Thus will he lead us forth to liberty and safety, and deliver us from the power and expectation of our strongest enemies.—He sometimes answers prayer in so unexpected a manner, that his people can scarcely believe it a reality: nay, their fears and misapprehensions may for a time exclude the joy to which he calls them, and even that joy, when excited, being accompanied with other tumultuous passions, may unfit them for the employment of the present moment; but the whole will surely terminate in adoring and rejoicing praises and thanksgivings.—It is our duty to take care of our lives, so long as the Lord sees good to preserve us; to shelter ourselves from the

CHAPTER XIII.

Barnabas and Saul, by the command of the Holy Spirit, are set apart from among other teachers at Antioch, with fasting and prayer, and sent forth to preach the Gospel, 1—3. Attended by John Mark, they arrive at Cyprus, and preach at Salamis, 4, 5. At Paphos, Elymas the sorcerer, opposing them, is smitten with blindness, and the deputy, Sergius Paulus, believes, 6—12. They pass through Pamphylia (where Mark leaves them) to Antioch in Pisidia, 13, 14. Saul, now named Paul, preaches in the synagogue, showing that Jesus is the Messiah, through whom all believers are pardoned and justified; and warning his hearers not to reject him, 15—41. The Gentiles desire to hear the word again; and some Jews and proselytes join Paul and Barnabas, 42, 43. Almost the whole city throng to hear the word, 44. The envious Jews gainsay and blaspheme; and the apostles turn to the Gentiles, of whom many believe, 45—49. The Jews raise a persecution, and drive Paul and Barnabas away, who go to Iconium, 50, 51. The disciples are filled with joy and with the Holy Spirit, 52.

NOW there were [a]in the church that was at Antioch certain [b]prophets and teachers; as [c]Barnabas, and Simeon that was called Niger, and [d]Lucius of Cyrene, and Manaen, [e]which had been brought up with [e]Herod the tetrarch, [f]and Saul.

2 As [g]they ministered to the Lord, [h]and fasted, [i]the Holy Ghost said, [k]Separate me Barnabas and Saul for [l]the work whereunto I have called them.

3 And when [m]they had fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on them, [n]they sent them away.

4 ¶ So they, [o]being sent forth by the Holy Ghost, departed unto Seleucia; and from thence they sailed to [p]Cyprus.

5 And when they were at Salamis, they preached the word of God [q]in the synagogues of the Jews: and they had also [r]John to [s]their minister.

6 And when they had gone through the isle unto Paphos, they found a [t]certain sorcerer, [u]a false prophet, [v]a Jew, [x]whose name was Bar-jesus;

7 Which was with [y]the deputy of the country, Sergius Paulus, [z]a prudent man; who called for Barnabas and Saul, and desired to hear the word of God.

8 But Elymas the sorcerer (for so is his name by interpretation) [b]withstood them, seeking to turn away the deputy from the faith.

9 Then Saul, [c]who also is called Paul, [d]filled with the Holy Ghost, [e]set his eyes on him, violence of furious enemies; and likewise to give encouragement from our experience, to those who are exposed to similar dangers; as well as to excite them to praise God in our behalf.

V. 18—25. The instruments of persecution are exposed to the most imminent danger: (Notes, Dan. 3:19—23. 6:24.) the wrath of God is suspended over all who engage in this hateful work; and the tyranny of persecutors, when obstructed in its course, is apt to burst forth on every one who comes in its way, without regard to equity and mercy. But those who thus "fight against God," ripen apace for more signal vengeance; while they are buoyed up, with success and flattery, into the most extravagant pride and arrogance.—We may, however, learn wisdom from the policy of the Tyrians and Zidonians: for we have justly offended the almighty Lord with our sins; we entirely depend on him for "life, and breath, and all things:" it surely then behooves to humble ourselves before him, that, through the appointed Mediator, who is ever ready to befriend us, we may be reconciled to him, before "wrath come upon us to the uttermost;" as it did upon proud Herod, who, while others trembled at his impotent rage, would not fear the almighty God! But, "a haughty spirit is before a fall:" "God resisteth the proud" as his rivals and enemies; angels gladly vindicate his glory, by crushing the sacrilegious competitors; the whole creation stands ready to avenge its Creator's cause upon those who refuse to give him the glory; and the most contemptible insects or vermin are able to degrade, vilify, and torment those haughty rebels, who affect to be worshipped as deities. (Note, Ex. 8:16,17.) "The triumphing of the wicked is short:" the word of God, and the cause of the gospel, have stood their ground against many such boasting persecutors and opposers as Herod; their destruction has made way for its more abundant success; and the ruin of every one, who shall hereafter engage against the cause of Christ, will introduce its still further progress. (Note, Rev. 19:11—21.) But they who labour to promote it, shall "go from strength to strength," and proceed from one service to another, till their work is finished; and then they shall enter into those glorious mansions, from which their eyes shall behold, and only behold, the destruction of the workers of iniquity.

NOTES.—CHAP. XIII. V. 1—3. The first considerable church of converts, consisting chiefly of the Gentiles, seems to have been collected at Antioch in Syria: so that it was the principal place of residence for those teachers who went forth to preach among the Gentiles, even as Jerusalem was in respect of the Jewish converts. Several eminent persons were, at the time to which this chapter relates, resident there, (besides their stated pastors,) who were well qualified as teachers, and endowed with the gift of prophecy.—The surname of Niger, or "Black," by which Simeon was known, seems to have been given him on account of his complexion; perhaps he was a negro. Some have conjectured that this was Simon the Cyrenian, who was compelled to bear the cross after Jesus: and if so, Lucius was of the same country.—Manaen, who was educated along with Herod Antipas, the tetrarch, had probably renounced considerable prospects for the sake of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. a—f.)—While these persons were employed in devotional exercises, in the intervals of their sacred ministry, and were observing a day of solemn fasting and prayer, probably in order to seek a blessing on their labours, and direction concerning their future progress; they were ordered, by an immediate revelation of the Holy Spirit, to "separate Barnabas and Saul for the work unto which he had called them." (Marg. Ref. g—l.) This language evidently implies the personality and Deity of the Holy Spirit. (Note, 10:17—23. John 14:15—17. 16:7—13. 1 Cor. 12:4—11.) The work intended was the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles at large, of which Saul had some previous information when he was converted. (Notes, 22:17—21. 26:16—18.)—The prophets and teachers, in laying their hands on them, with fasting and prayer, acted by immediate order from the Holy Spirit; thus giving a public testimony to their assured confidence, that they were divinely appointed to that service, and expressing fervent desires for their success in it. (Marg. Ref. m, n.) Accordingly, they are said to have been "sent forth by the Holy Ghost." (4)—Barnabas and Saul had, for a considerable time, been ministers of the word: so that this imposition of hands could not be for the purpose of ordaining them; nor does it appear, that any spiritual gift, or new authority was conferred by it. (Note, 8:14—17.)—St. Paul was "an apostle, not by man:" (Note, Gal. 1:1,2.) his apostolical office could not then be conferred at this time; but his appointment by the Lord Jesus himself, as the apostle of the Gentiles, might thus be publicly acknowledged, in the principal church of Gentile converts. Barnabas also is afterwards spoken of as an apostle. (14:14.) Perhaps he was appointed by the Holy Spirit to that office, on this occasion; with some reference to the martyrdom of James, by which the number of the apostles was diminished. (Note, 14:24—28.)

V. 4, 5. Seleucia was a seaport about fifteen miles from Antioch. It does not appear that Saul and Barnabas preached there: but thence they passed into the island of Cyprus, the native place of Barnabas, (4:36.) and they had an opportunity of preaching in the synagogues at Salamis, the first city to which they came.—If the sentence of excommunication, which had been published against those who confessed Jesus to be the Christ was still in force: (John 11:57.) it is evident, that it was little noticed at a distance from Jerusalem: for the apostles were not refused admission into the synagogues, and were constantly allowed to preach in them. (Marg. Ref. p, q.)—John Mark accompanied Paul and Barnabas to perform such services by their direction, as he was capable of: with a view no doubt of his being employed more and more, as a preacher of the gospel. 16 Then Paul stood up, and [b]beckoning with his hand, said, [c]Men of Israel, [d]and ye that fear God, [e]give audience.

17 The [f]God of this people of Israel chose our fathers, [g]and exalted the people when they dwelt as strangers in the land of Egypt, [h]and with a high arm brought he them out of it.

18 And [i]about the time of forty years [j]suffered he their manners in the wilderness.

19 And [k]when he had destroyed seven nations in the land of [l]Chanaan, [m]he divided their land to them by lot.

Jews and the Gentiles; till they arrived at Paphos, on the opposite side of it. This city was celebrated for the temple there dedicated to Venus, and infamous for the licentiousness practised at it. Here they met with a noted sorcerer, or magician, named Bar-jesus, that is, "the son of Jesus." This man being a Jew, pretended to be a prophet, and confirming his pretensions by magical arts, was endeavouring to gain the attention of the proconsul of Cyprus, or the Roman governor appointed by the senate. (Marg. Ref. t—y.) The proconsul, however, was an intelligent and considerate person, who desired to know the truth in these highly interesting concerns; and having heard of Saul and Barnabas, he invited them to come and declare the word of God unto him. But Bar-jesus, (who was also called "Elymas," from an Arabic word signifying a sorcerer,) foreseeing the ruin of his own character and influence, in case the proconsul should embrace the gospel; did all that he could to oppose the apostles, and to prejudice him against their doctrine. It may be supposed, that he disputed against the truth of the facts which they testified; misrepresented the nature and tendency of their doctrine; insinuated many things in a subtle and malicious manner, against their intentions and to their disadvantage; and perhaps he performed some of his "lying miracles" to support his own pretensions against them.—(Marg. Ref. z—b.) But Saul, under the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit, "set his eyes upon him," as expressing his abhorrence of his crimes; declared him to be a man "full of subtlety," malignity, and mischief; "a child of the devil," who bare his image and supported his cause; and "an enemy of all righteousness," notwithstanding his plausible pretences: at the same time sharply expostulating with him, for thus pertinaciously misrepresenting and speaking evil of "the right ways of the Lord," that he might countenance his own vile impostures. He then denounced sentence upon him, as in the name of God, that he should be struck blind, so that, "for a season," he should be unable to see the light of the sun; though, in case he repented, the calamity might at length be removed, as a similar one had been in the case of Saul himself. (Notes, 9:8,9,17—22.) This sentence was immediately executed by the power of God: and, being enveloped in darkness, and filled with horror and confusion, he sought some person to lead him out of the place: an apt emblem of the benighted state of his soul. (Marg. Ref. d—m.) This decided victory of the apostles over their opponent, being connected with the other clear evidences of the truth of the gospel, and made effectual by the power of the Holy Spirit, induced the proconsul to embrace and profess Christianity: for "he was astonished," both at the energy of the doctrine upon his heart and conscience, and at the power of God by which it was confirmed. (Marg. Ref. o, p.)—Some think that he was the first idolatrous Gentile, who was converted to Christ: but it is not probable, that all the Gentile converts at Antioch had previously been proselyted from idolatry; or that Saul and Barnabas had made no converts from idolatry in their progress through Cyprus. The conversion, however, of so eminent a person was a very memorable event: probably he continued for some time in his high station, serving the Lord Jesus in the use of his authority, and countenancing the professors and preachers of the gospel by his influence and example.—Saul is here said to have been "also called Paul;" (9) and henceforth he bears that name. As this is the same with the proconsul's surname; some have thought that he assumed it on account of the conversion of this ruler: but it is more probable, that before this the Greeks had called him Paul, and the Hebrews Saul; and that, from this time, being generally conversant with the Gentiles, he was commonly known by the former name.—Dr. Lardner has, with great learning, vindicated the accuracy of St. Luke, in calling the governor a proconsul; and shown, that those who governed the provinces by the appointment of the senate, were called proconsuls, though they had never been consuls; and that Cyprus was at this time a province of that description.

V. 13—15. It does not appear, whether Paul and Barnabas had or had not any opportunity of preaching the gospel at Perga, or in Pamphylia: but John Mark by this time grew weary of the fatigue and hardship of the journey; and, foreseeing that they should meet with many perils and persecutions in their future progress, he consulted too much his own ease and inclinations; and so leaving them he returned to Jerusalem. (Marg. Ref. r, s. Notes, Matt. 8:21,22. Luke 9:57—62. Phil. 2:19—23.) This indicated an inconstancy of mind, unbecoming one who was engaged in so important a service; and the consequences resulting from this conduct are repeatedly mentioned, in the subsequent part of the sacred volume. (Notes, 4,5. 15:36—41. Col. 4:9—14, v. 10. 2 Tim. 4:9—13, v. 11.)—Paul and Barnabas, however, proceeded to Antioch in Pisidia, a province of Asia Minor, which was at a great distance from Antioch in Syria, whence they set out. There they went into the synagogue on the sabbath-day: and after the sections, from the law of Moses and from the writings of the prophets, had been read, the rulers of the synagogue invited them to speak to the congregation. (Marg. Ref. z, a. Note, 15:21. Luke 4:16—19.) Either they had previously heard of them, or from them; or something in their conduct indicated their desire to be heard. —The apostles frequented the synagogues on the sabbath-days, in order to find an opportunity to preach: but the disciples in general observed the first day of the week, for their assembling together. (Note, 20:7—12, v. 7.) Yet the Jewish converts seem also to have kept the sabbath for some time: and this change, as well as some others, appears to have been brought about gradually, to avoid giving needless offence to the Jews.—If ye have any, &c. (15) Literally, "If any word of exhortation be in you." V. 16—19. The apostle perhaps observed, that some present were indisposed to attend on his discourse: he therefore beckoned with his hand, to intimate his desire of a candid hearing; (12:17.) and then introduced his main subject by such a reference to the history of Israel, as was suited to conciliate their minds and to fix their attention. (Marg. Ref. b—d. Note, 7:1—8.)—Some explain the expression, "Ye that fear God," of the religious proselytes: (13) but it is plain, that there were Gentiles, as well as proselytes, in the synagogue; (42) perhaps some place was allotted to them, in hopes that they would soon embrace the Jewish religion, as others already had done.—The apostle reminded them, that the God of Israel had of old chosen their fathers; and likewise had formerly raised their nation from a state of deep depression in Egypt, to great honour and prosperity in Canaan. He had with mighty power delivered them from bondage, graciously borne with their provocations for forty years in the wilderness, destroyed the Canaanites, and then divided the land by lot among them.—These events were both an accomplishment of the promises made to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, in whose "Seed all the nations of the earth would be blessed," and a type of a better and more spiritual redemption. (Marg. Ref. e—i. Notes, Deut. 7:6—8. Neh. 9:7. Is. 41:8,9. 51:1—3. Ez. 16:6—8. 20:5,6. 1 Pet. 2:9,10.)

V. 20. This verse has peculiar difficulties connected with it. The time which elapsed from the departure of Israel out of Egypt to the building of Solomon's temple, was no more than four hundred and eighty years. (Note, 1 Kings 6:1.) But, on the lowest computation, fifty-seven years elapsed, from the passage of the Red Sea to the death of Joshua; and eighty-four years, during the days of Samuel, Saul, and David, and till the fourth year of Solomon: and this leaves only three hundred and thirty-nine years, from the death of Joshua to the times of Samuel. So that, without adverting to the difficulties of computing the years during the judges; (Notes, Judg. 3:11. 11:25,26.) it is evident that this general calculation cannot possibly allow four hundred and fifty years for that part of the history, even continuing it to twenty years after the death of Eli. Some alteration, therefore, seems unavoidably needful either in this narrative, or in the general statement in Kings. On this ground some think that three hundred and fifty years should be read, in this place, instead of four hundred and fifty: and it is evident, that the error might easily be made by a transcriber. This would bring the computation within about ten or eleven years: and as the historian says, "about the space, &c." it might be improper to expect greater accuracy. There is, however, no authority which warrants such a change in the text.—'Josephus saith, that Solomon began to build the temple ... five hundred and ninety-two years after the children of Israel's departure out of Egypt. Now if you make the time of the Judges four hundred and fifty years, the computation is exactly five hundred and ninety-one years. He' (Paul) 'therefore, here ... accords with the computation of his nation, at that time, that so they might not except against his words. Wilderness 40, Joshua 17, Judges 450, Samuel and Saul 40, David 40, Solomon 4—591.... St. Luke continually follows exactly the computation of the Septuagint and of the Jews, as we learn from his inserting Cainan; (Luke 3:36.) his making Saul to reign forty years; (21) and from this verse, where he accords exactly with Josephus.' Whitby. Perhaps this learned writer did not recollect, that this computation of Josephus alters the whole system of biblical chronology. For the chronology of the Hebrew Scripture to the Exodus, and from the building of the temple till the coming of Christ, is founded on grounds sufficiently firm: but if one hundred and twelve years, more than the general computation, passed between the Exodus and the building of the temple; then the birth of Christ took place in the year of the world 4115, instead of 4004. It is well known, or at least generally acknowledged, that the chronology, both of the Septuagint and of Josephus, is erroneous and perplexed, in no ordinary degree: but how far the apostle, and Luke in recording his discourse, took these unimportant matters as they found them, is another question: and if they did so, the circumstance of learned men in their studies having discovered that those generally admitted calculations were inaccurate, has, in my view, nothing to do with the divine inspiration, of either the preacher or the historian. For they were inspired, to deliver divine truth to mankind, unsophisticated and unmutilated: not to correct genealogies, or give chronological calculations. Even, on the supposition, that the apostle was aware of the inaccuracy; it would have obstructed his grand object, to advance any new opinion, or to go out of his way to correct the current one.—'Grotius and Usher note here, that other copies read thus; "He divided to them their land about four hundred and fifty years, and after that he gave them judges:" and they begin the time of this computation from the birth of Isaac, ... and to the end of seven years, (in Canaan,) when the land was divided to them, was about four hundred and fifty years.' Whitby. I agree with this writer, that this is not the natural or obvious construction of the passage: but could it stand without any alteration of the text, it might be admitted.—"And after these things which took up about four hundred and fifty years, he gave them judges, &c." This would require no change in the text: but I doubt whether it be not wholly inadmissible; and if so, we must recur to the solution above given.

V. 21. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. Notes, 1 Sam. 8:—12:) 'David was but thirty years of age, when he began to reign over Judah, which was not till after Saul was slain: (2 Sam. 5:4.) and Samuel did not only anoint him, (at which time we cannot suppose David to have been less than fifteen years old,) but lived a considerable time after.... The authority of Josephus is urged:... for he says,... that Saul reigned eighteen years during Samuel's life,... and twenty-two after his death:... but this is utterly incredible: for then David could not be eight years old when Samuel anointed him.' Doddridge.—Indeed, as many subsequent events, which must have occupied several years, took place, between the anointing of David and the death of Samuel; (Notes, 1 Sam. 16: —25:1.) it is certain, according to the scriptural history, that Saul survived Samuel but a short time: and every circumstance combines to prove, that all the years during which Samuel judged Israel, and Saul reigned, are here intended. 'I suppose, that the years of Samuel also are added to the reign of the king, by Paul:' Sulpitius Severus: 'as doubtless they were, they making together just forty years.' Whithy.

V. 24—37. 'He indicates that John was the herald of Christ, who did not foretell his coming as a distant event: but

37 But [e]he, whom God raised again, saw no corruption. [Practical Observations.]
38 ¶ Be [f]it known unto you therefore, men and brethren, [g]that through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins:
39 And [h]by him all that believe are justified from all things, [i]from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses.
40 [k]Beware therefore, lest that come upon you [l]which is spoken of in the prophets; pointed him out as already come.' Beza. (Note, Matt. 11: 13—15.) The Jews, who were present, had doubtless heard of John's ministry; and of his declaration that he was not the Messiah, but his forerunner; and probably some report had reached them of his testimony to Jesus. (Marg. Ref. a—c. Notes, Matt. 3:1—12. John 1:6—9,19—42. 3:27—36.) The apostle therefore referred them to that testimony, while he pressed them all, both the descendants of Abraham, and all others who worshipped God, to believe and embrace "the word of salvation" which had been sent to them. He then obviated the prejudice, which would arise in their minds against his doctrine, from the conduct of the rulers at Jerusalem: observing, that they indeed had not known their Messiah, when he appeared in the midst of them: (Marg. Ref. f—k. Notes, John 16:1—3. 1 Cor. 1:6—9.) nor had they understood the Scriptures, which were publicly and constantly read among them. (Note, 13—15.)—Thus they had ignorantly fulfilled them, by judging and condemning Jesus, and procuring his crucifixion from Pilate; though they could allege no crime against him, except that he declared himself to be "the Son of God." And when they had, without designing it, fulfilled the various predictions of the prophets, concerning his sufferings and death; they allowed him to be taken down from the cross and buried, and then guarded the sepulchre with all care to prevent any imposition. (Marg. Ref. l—n. Notes, 2:22—24. Matt. 27:57—66.) But "God had raised him from the dead;" which was testified by a great number of most unexceptionable witnesses. (Marg. Ref. o—q. Note, John 20:24—29.) Accordingly they (even Paul and Barnabas) had travelled as far as Antioch to declare to their brethren "the glad tidings," that God had fulfilled in their days the promise made to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and David, in raising from the dead the Lord Jesus, and thus attesting him to be his only begotten Son, according to the prophecy of the Messiah contained in the second Psalm. (Marg. Ref. r—t. Note, Ps. 2:7—9.) The passage here quoted shows that the Messiah was "the Son of God," in a peculiar sense; and the decree there mentioned was confirmed, when he was "declared to be the Son of God with power, by his resurrection from the dead." (Note, Rom. 1:1—4.)—In respect of that event, it might be inferred from the words of the Lord by his prophet, declaring that he would give to believers "the sure mercies of David." (Marg. Ref. u, x. Notes, 2 Sam. 23:5. Is. 55:1—3.) These "sure mercies" especially referred to the promised Messiah, and his kingdom and salvation: but the prophet predicted also the sufferings and death of the Messiah in the strongest terms; (Notes, Ps. 22: 69: Is. 53: Dan. 9:24—27. Zech. 13:7.) so that these "sure mercies" could not be conferred, but through his resurrection and exaltation. Accordingly David had prophesied in another Psalm, that "God would not suffer his holy One to see corruption." (Notes, 2:25—32. Ps. 16:8—11.) This could not be understood of David himself: for, having served the interests of Israel, during that generation in which he lived, "according to the will of God, he fell on sleep;" and, being laid to his fathers, "he saw," or turned to "corruption." But Jesus, his Descendant and Antitype, having arisen on the third day, "saw no corruption;" nor was he again to die and return to the grave, the scene of corruption; but to live for ever in heavenly glory: and it does not appear, that any other person, since the world began, actually died, and yet did not eventually see corruption. Enoch and Elijah were "translated that they should not see death." Those whom the prophets, and Jesus, and the apostles, raised, afterwards died and returned to dust; and those who rose after Christ's resurrection it is probable, had "seen corruption." Every part therefore of the doctrine accorded to the predictions of the prophets; which concurred with the testimony of the apostles to the resurrection of Jesus, and with the miracles wrought by him and them, to demonstrate that he was the promised Messiah. The several quotations are nearly in the words of the Septuagint, which accord with the Hebrew.—The second psalm. (33) The Psalms were arranged in the same order as they are at present.

As there is no preposition to either clause, the words may be rendered "Having served," or "ministered unto the will," or counsel "of God, in his own generation, he fell asleep, &c." And this seems the more exact view of the subject. "The counsel of God," to which David ministered, related to many generations: but he fulfilled his service during his life: whereas Christ fulfils a most important part of his office, subsequent to his death, as risen and ascended and glorified.

V. 38—41. The apostle here applied the doctrine, which he had stated and proved. It was of the utmost importance to the people, to be assuredly convinced, that through this person, even Jesus the incarnate Son of God, forgiveness of sins was preached to them, by his atoning sacrifice, and as the gift of his mercy; and that none could possibly obtain that benefit, save by faith in him. (Marg. Ref. f, g. Notes, 2:37—40. Luke 24:44—49, vv. 46,47.) But all that believed would be completely justified from every charge brought against them on account of their sins; and in such a manner, as could not be done according to the Mosaic law. (Marg. Ref. h, i.) There were several crimes, for which no sacrifices were appointed, but to which the sentence of death was annexed, by that law: (Note, Ps. 51:16.) nor could the legal sacrifices take away guilt from the conscience; except as the penitent offender, through them, had a believing dependence on the promised Redeemer and his atoning sacrifice. (Notes, Heb. 9:8—28. 10:1—18.) That whole dispensation also was now virtually abolished; having lost all its efficacy; and could not profit those who rejected the salvation of Jesus. (Note, Heb. 10:26,27.)—It therefore behooved them to beware, lest the awful denunciations of the prophets, against the despisers of the mercy and justice of God, should come upon them.—"The work" here spoken of, may be that of redemption by the blood of Christ; or rather, that of approaching vengeance on the Jews for their contempt of him, and the admission of the Gentiles to their forfeited privileges. (Marg. Ref. k, l. Notes, 2:14—21. 6:9—14.) All these were fully testified, authenticated, or predicted; but the scornful men of that age and nation would not believe them, and therefore they would be filled with astonishment, and so perish. (Notes, Is. 28:12—22. Hab. 1:5.)—The prophecies referred to seem primarily to have related to the Babylonish captivity; but they were still more awfully accomplished in the destruction of Jerusalem, and the rejection of the Jews, with tremendous judgments, for their opposition to the gospel. (Marg. Ref. m, n.)—This discourse, and the subsequent verses, are worthy of particular consideration; especially for the representation which it gives of the apostle's message; and as it enters so explicitly, in the way of the epistles, into the doctrine of justification by Christ. (Notes, Rom. 3:19—26. 4:1—8. 5:1,2.)—The gospel which the apostle brought, was the fulfilment of the great promise made to the fathers. (23,29,32.) It was the word of God. (44,46.

43 Now, when the congregation was broken up, many of the Jews [q]and religious proselytes [r]followed Paul and Barnabas; who, speaking to them, [s]persuaded them to continue in [t]the grace of God.

44 ¶ And the next sabbath-day [u]came almost the whole city together to hear the word of God.

45 But when the Jews saw the multitudes, [v]they were filled with envy, and [w]spake against those things which were spoken by Paul, contradicting and blaspheming.

46 Then Paul and Barnabas [x]waxed bold, and said, [z]It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you: but [a]seeing ye put it from you, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we [b]turn to the Gentiles:

47 For [c]so hath the Lord commanded us, saying, [d]I have set thee to be a Light of the Gentiles [e]that thou shouldest be for salvation unto the ends of the earth.

48 And when the Gentiles heard this, [f]they were glad, [g]and glorified the word of the Lord: [h]and as many as were [i]ordained to eternal life, believed.

49 And the word of the Lord [k]was published throughout all the region.

50 But [l]the Jews stirred up the [m]devout and [n]honourable women, and the chief men of the city, [o]and raised persecution against Paul and Barnabas, [p]and expelled them out of their coasts.

51 But [q]they shook off the dust of their feet against them, and came unto [r]Iconium.

52 And the disciples [s]were filled with joy, and [t]with the Holy Ghost.

It related to a Saviour and salvation, "the word of this salvation." (23,26,47.) Repentance was the great preparation; (24) the forgiveness of sins and full justification its primary blessings; (38,39) and its great scope, its ultimate blessing, "everlasting life;" (46,48) and these blessings were restricted to believers in Jesus, and extended to all of them without exception.—Behold, &c. V. 42—48. When the congregation were leaving the synagogue, the Jews in general did not express a desire of hearing the apostles any more; but the Gentiles entreated that these words might be spoken again to them the next sabbath-day. Some render the words, "in the intervening week;" (Marg.) but the concourse of people on the ensuing sabbath establishes the sense of our translation; though it is probable, that the private labours of Paul and Barnabas, during the week, concurred in bringing together so great a multitude on the next sabbath-day. Several Jews and religious proselytes, however, followed Paul and Barnabas, professing faith in Jesus; whom they exhorted and persuaded to continue in attendance on the gospel, and in dependence on the mercy and grace of God revealed in it; and not to suffer themselves to be discouraged or perverted by any of the reasonings, revilings, or persecutions, which were used to turn them aside from the truth. (Marg. Ref. r, s. Notes, 11:23,24. 14:21—23.) On the ensuing sabbath, almost all the inhabitants of the city, idolaters as well as others, were drawn together, by various motives, to hear what the apostles had to communicate. This, instead of rejoicing the Jews, filled them with envy and indignation; because the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom, and the peculiar privileges belonging to the people of God, were thus set before the Gentiles, and inquired after by them: and their prejudices against the gospel being thus increased; they set themselves to contradict the testimony and doctrine of the apostles, reviling them as impostors; and, it is probable, blaspheming the Lord Jesus, and his miracles and authority. (Marg. Ref. t—x.) When therefore Paul and Barnabas saw the inveteracy of their malice, they took courage to testify against them; observing, that it was indeed necessary, according to the promises of the Scripture, and the express command of Christ, that the gospel should first be proposed to them; (Note, Luke 21:44—49, vv. 47,48.) but since they decidedly rejected it, and were condemned out of their own mouths, as unworthy of eternal life, and improper persons to receive so infinitely valuable a gift; (Marg. Ref. y—a. Notes, Prov. 8:35,36. Ez. 18:30—32, v. 32.) those who were sent to preach it would unreservedly make the same proposal to the Gentiles, and associate with them. For this, they had not only the command of the Lord Jesus, but the authority of their Scriptures; which had declared that the Messiah was to be set for "the Light of the Gentiles, and for salvation to the ends of the earth." (Marg. Ref. b—e. Note, Is. 49:5, 6.)—This declaration rejoiced the Gentiles, who honoured and respected the word of God, while the Jews opposed and perverted it; and though it is not probable that all who were thus affected at first, did at that time "believe unto salvation;" yet many did, even "as many as were ordained to eternal life." (Marg. Ref. f—h.)—Some interpret the word here used, of the internal disposition of the heart of the hearers: those who were in earnest to obtain eternal life at all adventures, believed the gospel. This indeed does not seem the meaning of the word; yet as such a disposition is the effect of preventing grace, it still leads us back to that humiliating doctrine, which so much labour is employed in vain to obscure or exclude. (Notes, Phil. 2:12,13. Jam. 1:16—18. See Art. x. of the Church of England.) 'O God, from whom all holy desires, all good counsels, and all just works do proceed, &c.' Col. 'The translators of the English Testament give many words a predestinarian sense, which there is no reason for.' Gilpin. The justice of this remark may fairly be disputed: but it shows at least, what even an opponent allows to have been the creed of the translators; for men do not generally, in translating or commenting, give words a meaning contrary to their own decided opinions, without very strong reasons for so doing.—It is indeed useless, and highly improper, and quite unnecessary, to rest the argument on a word, which may perhaps admit of some other meaning: but the laboured discussions of those who are greatly afraid lest the doctrine of gratuitous personal election to eternal life should be collected from it, leave this impression on my mind, that these writers would themselves have carefully avoided a term, which needs so much guarding against misconstruction.—I have set, &c. V. 49—52. The indefatigable and successful labours of the apostles, exasperated more and more the unbelieving Jews: and they, being themselves destitute of authority, excited some women of rank, who had embraced and were peculiarly zealous for the Jewish religion; and by their means the magistrates were stirred up against the apostles: so that an edict was obtained, banishing them from the city and its adjacent territory, as disturbers of the public peace. They, therefore, having solemnly warned their persecutors, in the way which Jesus had commanded, that they were thus exposing themselves to the wrath of God, (Marg. Ref. m—p Notes, 18:1—6. Matt. 10:11—15.) went to Iconium, a city to the northeast of Antioch. But the new converts, whom they left behind, instead of being discouraged by this opposition,

CHAPTER XIV.

Paul and Barnabas preach with success at Iconium; and being driven thence by the Jews, they preach at Lystra, 1—7. They heal a man who had been a cripple from his birth, 8—10. The priests and people attempt to sacrifice to them as gods, and are hardly restrained by their most earnest expostulations, 11—18. Paul is stoned, at the instigation of the Jews from Antioch and Iconium, and left for dead; but reviving, he goes with Barnabas to Derbe, 19, 20. They return to Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch, confirming the churches, and ordaining elders in each of them, 21—23. Passing through Pisidia, Pamphylia, and Perga, they sail to Antioch in Syria, and rehearse to the church what things God had wrought by them, 24—28.

AND it came to pass [a]in Iconium, that they [b]went both together into the synagogue of the Jews, and so spake, [c]that a great multitude both of the Jews and also of the [d]Greeks believed.

2 But [e]the unbelieving Jews stirred up the Gentiles, and made their minds evil affected against the brethren.

3 Long time [f]therefore abode they [g]speaking boldly in the Lord, [h]which gave testimony unto [i]the word of his grace, [k]and granted signs and wonders to be done by their hands.

4 But [l]the multitude of the city was divided:

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. The Lord raises up instruments for his work, and brings them forth from various places and situations in life: and that zeal for his glory, with which he inspires their hearts, induces them to renounce the most pleasing connexions, and flattering prospects, that they may be employed in promoting his cause.—Whatever means are used, or rules observed, for ordaining ministers; the Holy Spirit alone can fit them for their important work, and call them forth to it: but "fasting and prayer" are highly proper attendants on their separation to that sacred service.—Those who 'are moved by the Holy Ghost to take this office upon them,' and "are sent forth by him," will find opportunities of exercising their ministry. The ignorance, carelessness, and profligacy of numbers, will indeed obstruct their usefulness: yet false teachers, and vain pretenders to religion, are the most pernicious opposers of the gospel: for they prejudice the minds of inquirers by their misconduct; or induce them, through misrepresentations and perversions, to embrace some vain delusion, instead of "the truth as it is in Jesus." "Prudent men," however, who know the value of their souls, and the importance of eternal things, will desire to hear the word of God, and to give it a fair and careful investigation, whatever be their rank in life.—It does not behoove us, who have no miraculous powers, or infallible guidance of the Holy Spirit, to use such decided language, in reproving opposers and deceivers, as Paul did to "Elymas the sorcerer:" yet we may plainly expose the hypocrisy, disingenuity, malice, and enmity, of those children and servants of "the wicked one," who show themselves to be "enemies to all righteousness," by deliberately "perverting the right ways of the Lord," and the evident truths of the gospel, to promote their own credit and interest. Assuredly "their end will be according to their works:" their wilful blindness will expose them to judicial blindness, and this will terminate "in the blackness of darkness for ever;" unless they repent during the season of the Lord's long-suffering towards them: and the truth of God will be established and made successful, by the ruin and confusion of all its opposers.

V. 13—22. Those "who put their hands to the plough, and look back, are not fit for the kingdom of God." If we are not prepared to face opposition, and to endure hardship, we are not properly qualified for the work of the ministry. Yet some, who at first disappointed the expectation of senior ministers, have afterwards been recovered and made useful. The reading of the Scriptures, in the public assemblies of God's people, is an ancient and excellent usage; and they who are called to preach the gospel, will find a peculiar advantage, in laying their credentials and instructions in this manner before the people. Yet alas! many both read and hear the word of God, who do not understand or believe it; and the Scriptures are alas, very often so read in our churches, that it might be supposed, the readers did not desire to be heard and understood by the congregation!—The gospel should be "preached to every creature:" yet with an especial address to those "who fear God," and inquire after the way in which his favour may be obtained. On some occasions, it is advisable to put the case most favourably, in respect of the dispositions and profession of our hearers; that we may thence take occasion to reason with them from their own principles, and to exhort them to behave consistently with their characters.—Every transient view of the dealings of God with his church reminds us of his mercy and long-suffering, and of man's ingratitude and perverseness: but when he grants our inordinate desires, we may expect a scourge instead of a comfort. He will however remove those who rebel against him; that he may raise up others in his church, who may act more "according to his own heart, to fulfil all his will." May this be done, both in respect of rulers and ministers of religion, all over the earth, and that speedily. Amen.

V. 23—37. The most honoured servants of God have discovered or been conscious of great imperfection; and have confessed themselves unworthy to perform the meanest service to the divine Saviour. They call men to repentance, and direct their attention to Jesus: yet they soon fulfil their course, and are gathered to their fathers; but "he ever liveth to serve to the uttermost all them, who come to God through him." (Note, Heb. 7:23—25.) Still this "word of salvation is sent to us;" and every one who truly fears God will accept of it. But too many fulfil the Scriptures, by opposing the truth through ignorance and unbelief; after the example of those who "crucify the Lord of glory." May we then look to him, as "declared to be the Son of God with power by his resurrection from the dead," "now no more to return to corruption," as testified to by prophets and apostles, and as the substance and repository of "the sure mercies of David;" that, by faith in him, we may walk with God, and "serve our generation according to his will;" and when death comes may fall asleep in him, with a joyful hope of a blessed resurrection.

V. 38—52. Forgiveness of sins through Jesus Christ, and him alone, should be preached to all men; for this is the most needful blessing for every sinner, and an introduction to all others; "and by him all that believe are justified from all their sins," be they ever so numerous and aggravated; a privilege which no law or institution besides could ever confer. (Notes, Ps. 32:1,2. Rom. 4:6—8. P. O. 1—8. Note, 5:1—5.) But wo to those despisers, who will not believe the testimony of God, either concerning the redemption which he has wrought, or concerning the judgment which he has appointed; but treat the declaration of them with self-righteous, worldly, or infidel contempt, or with careless indifference! With what astonishment will they at length hear the despised Jesus denounce on them the sentence of everlasting condemnation! But, while immense numbers thus "judge themselves unworthy of everlasting life;" others, and those often the most unlikely persons, desire to hear more of the glad tidings of salvation: thus the prodigal "comes to himself" returns home, and is welcomed and feasted; whilst the elder brother is filled with indignation and envy, and begins to oppose, contradict, and blaspheme. (Notes, Matt. 21:28—32. Luke 15: 20—32. P. O. 17—32.) We must not, however, be satisfied with hopeful appearances: but exhort such as are thus seriously impressed, to "continue in the grace of God," and instruct them in what manner to resist the temptations to which they will be exposed. (Notes, John 8:30—36. 15:3—11.)—As many as are "ordained to eternal life" will believe: but we know not previously who these are: we should therefore declare, that "Jesus is placed for a Light to the Gentiles, and for Salvation to the ends of the earth;" and we should publish his truth as extensively as we can; and bear our testimony against those who oppose and reject it, however honourable or devout they may appear. Thus the word of God will be glorified in the midst of persecution: and Jesus will fill his disciples with grace, peace, and "joy in the Holy Ghost," to support them under tribulations, and to render them triumphant over all the power and subtlety of the enemy of their souls.

V. 3, 4. The apostles judged it necessary to continue at Iconium for a considerable time, notwithstanding the persecution which was gathering against them; and boldly to fulfil their ministry in dependence on the Lord; in order to encourage and establish the new converts, that opposition and danger might not subvert them: and God was pleased at this time "to give testimony to the word of his grace," to enable them to work many miracles, which perhaps they had not done at Antioch. (Note, 4:29—31.) Thus a considerable part of the inhabitants either embraced the gospel, or favoured the cause: and these counteracting the machinations of their opponents, the apostles were for a time protected. (Marg Ref.)—'Our constancy ought to equal the obstinate perverseness of the wicked. . . . We should not give place, because of

V. 5—7. The rulers of the synagogue, and the principal persons among the Jews, seem to have gained over to their party the magistrates of the city, who were Gentiles. Thus a plan was formed, and an attempt made, violently to apprehend Paul and Barnabas; and, having disgraced and insulted them, as disturbers of the city, to stone them as blasphemers. But this conspiracy was discovered by some at the very crisis of danger: and thus the apostles escaped, and went first to Lystra, and afterwards to Derbe, (20) where, not at all discouraged by perils or ill usage, they boldly "preached the gospel." (Marg. Ref. Note, 1 Thes. 2:1—8.)—The situation of these cities may be far better understood by a good map, than by any description in words.

It is probable that, by a divine suggestion, St. Paul knew that the man expected a cure from the power of the Lord Jesus, and that it was a proper occasion for him to perform a miracle. He therefore called to him with a loud voice, to stand upright on his feet; and he was enabled at once to use his limbs with as entire ease, agility, and vigour, as though he had never been lame. (Marg. Ref. a. Note, 3:1—11.) In some manuscripts and ancient versions it is added, after "a loud voice," and before "Stand," "I say unto thee, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ."

V. 11—18. When the idolaters saw this astonishing effect follow upon the speaking of a few words by Paul, they concluded, according to the fabulous traditions of their priests and poets, that two of their deities had become visible in human form. The age and gravity of Barnabas suggested to them the opinion, that he was Jupiter, their supreme deity: and Paul's promptitude, in speaking, joined perhaps to his personal appearance, led them to suppose that he was Mercury, the patron of eloquence, and as they imagined the interpreter of the gods. And so firmly were they persuaded of these things, that the priest of Jupiter, of whom there was a temple, or statue, near the gates of the city, was induced to bring bulls and garlands, either to decorate the sacrifices, or the intended objects of their worship; and they were about immediately to seek the favour of the apostles, by divine honours and a propitiatory offering! But Paul and Barnabas, discovering their intention, were more discomposed by it, than by all the persecution which they had experienced; and to express their detestation of their idolatry, and especially that themselves were become the objects of it, they rent their clothes and ran in among the people, expostulating with them about their conduct; protesting against the sacrilegious honours intended them; declaring that they were mere men like themselves, liable to the same infirmities, sufferings, and death; and reminding them that they came to preach to them that they should relinquish "these vanities" and delusions, and worship the great Creator of the universe. (Marg. Ref. f—o.) This was very bold and decided language to zealous idolaters, with their priests at the head of them, in such a critical juncture; and may be very properly contrasted with the temporizing conduct of heathen philosophers, who, being convinced of the folly and falsehood of the vulgar superstitions, not only conformed to them, but instructed their disciples to do the same, as a part of their duty to the republic. Thus they made hypocrisy and dissimulation in so important a matter, an essential part of their instructions, confirmed it by their example, and perpetrated as much as they could, the most stupid idolatry, connected with the most abominable vices, from generation to generation!—Let the intelligent reader compare this conduct and declaration of the apostles towards the worshippers of Jupiter, with some modern admired effusions of expanded candour, in which the worship of God, whether men call him JEHOVAH, Jove, Lord, or by any other name, is supposed to be equally acceptable to him. Is it then of no consequence whether JEHOVAH, or Jupiter, or Baal, be God? Surely either the prophets and apostles were bigots, or these men have renounced Christianity. (Note, 1 Kings 18:21. P. O. 17—29.)—Paul and Barnabas further added, that God had, in his unsearchable wisdom, justice, and long suffering, hitherto suffered all nations to walk in their own ways; and therefore idolatry had generally prevailed. (Marg. Ref. p. Notes, 17:24—31. Rom. 1:18—27.) Yet the idolaters were without excuse, as God had "not left himself without witness;" seeing he still had done them good in his providence; and afforded them many temporal benefits, which both satisfied their bodily necessities, and conduced to the joy and gladness of their hearts. (Marg. Ref. q—s. Notes, Jer. 14:19—22. Matt. 5:43—48.) By these discourses, they with difficulty restrained the people from proceeding with their sacrifice: yet it seems that they were by no means disposed to hear their doctrine at this time; but rather were displeased with their refusal of the honours intended them. (Notes, Matt. 21:8—11. 27:15—23.)—'As a friend, in sending us frequent presents, expresses his remembrance of us and affection to us, though he neither speaks nor writes, so all the gifts of the divine bounty, which are scattered abroad on every side, are so many witnesses sent to attest the divine care and goodness.' Doddridge.—'Here see,' saith Chrysostom, 'the devil's malice! He would have brought in ... divine worship of men, by those very persons who were sent to convert men from it! persuading them again to esteem men as gods, as formerly they had done! And how fully he hath done this in the Roman church, where innumerable men are worshipped with invocation, and even mental prayers, which suppose them to know the hearts of the supplicants, and so to have the property ascribed to God alone in the Scriptures, I have fully showed.' ... Cicero ... proves, the gods must be of human shape, because they never appeared in any other!' Whitby.—Like passions. (15) 'The pagans never denied that their gods were beings of like passions with themselves; but they attributed to them a total exemption from mortality and disease. ... Indeed this was not only the principal, but, I may almost say, the sole distinction they made between they the people, that they had not done sacrifice unto them. [Practical Observations.]

V. 19, 20. The apostles still continued at Lystra, in order to improve the advantage which the miracle they had wrought seemed to promise them. But when the Jews of Antioch and Iconium heard of their success and reputation, they followed them to Lystra, and by their insinuations induced the people to treat them as impostors, and disturbers of the peace. Accordingly they first assaulted Paul whose activity rendered him peculiarly obnoxious both to the Jews and the idolaters; and, stoning him till they supposed he had been dead, dragged him out of the city with the utmost indignity. Thus he who had concurred, with full approbation in stoning Stephen, was reminded of that great sin, by enduring the tortures of being stoned. But though he was bereft of sense and motion for a time, yet his life was in him: and whilst the disciples stood around him, probably intending to bury him, (Note, 8:2.) it pleased God to restore him miraculously to his strength, and to heal his bruises; so that he was able to travel the next day with Barnabas to Derbe. It is indeed intimated, that he was not dead: yet without a miracle, he could not, after being stoned and left for dead, have been able to travel, probably on foot, the very next day. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 9:36—43. 20:7—12. 2 Cor. 11:24—27. 2 Tim. 3:10—12.)

V. 21—23. After the apostles had published the glad tidings of salvation, and "made many disciples" in Derbe, they revisited the several cities, whence they had been driven by persecution; to instruct, encourage, and establish the new converts: "exhorting them to continue in the faith;" and showing them, that the kingdom of God and his heavenly felicity, must be entered through many afflictions, trials, and persecutions. (Marg. Ref. f—k. Notes, 11:23,24. 13:42—48. 1 Thes. 3:1—5.) They also appointed elders over them in every church. These elders were their stated pastors, who presided in the worship of God, and preached his word to them. (Marg. Ref. l, m.) In respect of the manner in which these elders were selected, it cannot be supposed, that the apostles, in their present circumstances, would appoint any to the sacred ministry who were not acceptable to the people, or that they would ordain any without their own full satisfaction that they were proper persons, whatever the people might be inclined to. There seems to have been the most perfect harmony in the management of this important concern: yet it can scarcely be doubted, that both the apostles, and those to whom, in some sense, they afterwards delegated this part of their authority, interfered with their judgment and influence, in the nomination of proper persons to the ministerial office; as well as set them apart by imposition of hands and prayer. In all such questions, the middle, between the extreme points contended for by the zealots of opposite parties, seems to be the nearest to the true state of the case.—As the churches increased, deacons were doubtless chosen, under the superintendence of the elders: but it does not appear that the apostles appointed any at this time.—After this was settled, the apostles, by prayer and fasting, commended the new converts to the gracious keeping of the Lord Jesus, in whom they had believed. (Marg. Ref. n, o.) It is probable, that the apostles, and those employed by them, selected the presbyters, or pastors, from such as were more signally made partakers of miraculous gifts by the Holy Spirit; yet, as these endowments might be possessed by those who had not true faith and grace; and, as eminent and intelligent believers do not seem always to have been endowed with them; it appears unscriptural to suppose that all such were appointed to the pastoral office, and none else.—No impartial person can (as it appears to me) read this passage, without being convinced, that stated resident pastors of each church, and not preachers of the gospel at large, are here intended: but whether these stated resident pastors were, as some argue, "bishops," according to the modern acceptation of the word is a subject which will hereafter come under our consideration. (Notes, 20:17. Phil. 1:1. 1 Tim. 3:1.)

V. 24—28. After some other labours in the regions of Asia Minor, the apostles returned to Antioch in Syria; (Marg Ref. p, q.) whence they had been recommended by the prayers of their brethren, "to the grace of God," for the work in which they had been so remarkably prospered. (Marg Ref. r, s. Notes, 13:1—5. 15:36—41.) To them they related their success; and showed how God had, by their ministry, "opened the door of faith," by which great numbers of the poor Gentiles had entered into the church: (Note, 11:18.) and, finding much work at Antioch, they continued there a long time among the disciples. (Marg. Ref. t—y.)—The thirteenth and fourteenth chapters contain the first history of a mission among the Gentiles. The missionaries were prepared and selected by the Holy Spirit: they were "recommended to the grace of God," and helped forward by their brethren; leaving country, friends, and comforts, to face dangers and endure hardships, from love to Christ, and to the souls of their unknown perishing fellow-sinners: they suffered much tribulation, but were supported, comforted, and preserved: and they prospered greatly in their "work and labour of love;" and returning to gladden the hearts of their brethren, and to rejoice with them, they ascribed all the glory to

CHAPTER XV.

Dissensions having been excited, in the church at Antioch, about circumcising the Gentile converts; Paul and Barnabas are sent to Jerusalem, to consult the apostles and elders on the question, 1, 2. They arrive at Jerusalem, and the apostles and elders assemble, 3—5. Peter declares his opinion, 6—11. Paul and Barnabas report what God had done by them among the Gentiles, 12. James decides against circumcising the Gentile converts, but proposes some rules for their conduct, 13—21. Letters are sent by messengers, accompanying Paul and Barnabas, to the churches, with the determination of the council, and that of the Holy Spirit also; which are received with joy, 22—31. Judas and Silas, the messengers, abide at Antioch, and labour there, 32—35. Paul and Barnabas purpose to revisit the churches which they had planted; but are separated by a sharp contention about John Mark; and set out to preach the gospel in different directions, 36—41.

AND [a]certain men which came down from Judea, taught [b]the brethren, and said, [c]Except ye be circumcised [d]after the manner of Moses, [e]ye cannot be saved.

2 When therefore [f]Paul and Barnabas had no small dissension and disputation with them, [g]they determined that Paul and Barnabas, and [h]certain other of them, [i]should go up to Jerusalem unto [k]the apostles and elders about this question.

3 And being [l]brought on their way by the church, they [m]passed through Phenice and Samaria, [n]declaring the conversion of the Gentiles: [o]and they caused great joy unto all the brethren.

4 And when they were come to Jerusalem, they were [p]received of the church, and of the apostles and elders, and they declared [q]all things that God had done with them.

5 But there rose up certain of [r]the sect of the Pharisees which believed, saying, [s]That it was needful to circumcise them, and to command them to keep the law of Moses.

6 ¶ And [t]the apostles and elders came together for to consider of this matter.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. Perseverance in doing good, amidst dangers, hardships, ingratitude, and persecution, is a blessed evidence of grace, an expression of "the mind which was in Christ," and a distinguishing mark of his faithful ministers.—The Lord will enable his true and zealous followers "so to speak," and he will so bless their word, that some in every place, and of divers descriptions, will be brought by their labours to "the obedience of faith." But great success commonly causes vehement opposition: and envious and malicious unbelievers excite the minds of those who are more moderate, and render them "evil affected against the brethren." This, however, should not discourage those who are prospered in their ministry: on the contrary, they should labour the more boldly and diligently, depending on the Lord to promote his own cause, and leaving it to him to "bear testimony to the word of his grace," in such ways as he sees good.—In all cities, towns, and villages, where the gospel is effectually preached, a division takes place among the people: some decidedly favouring, and others earnestly opposing the persons employed: and generally some unconverted persons, for a time, take part with the preachers and professors of the truth, by means of whom the Lord restrains the fury of his enemies, till his own purposes are effected.—Wherever his servants are driven, they should seek opportunities of making known his truth, without being intimidated by former perils or sufferings.—None should be considered as having derived benefit from the power and grace of Christ, by means of his ministers and ordinances, till they have "faith working by love," and show an unreserved obedience: but "all things are possible to those that believe." When we receive this most precious gift of God, we shall be delivered from that impotency in which we were born, and from the dominion of those inveterate habits, which we have ever since been contracting; and be enabled to walk with cheerfulness and thankful constancy in the ways of the Lord.

V. 11—18. The servants of God might often obtain undue honour to themselves, if they would connive at men's errors and vices; with far greater ease than they can prevail with them to honour God, by renouncing their vanities, believing his truth, and worshipping his name. But they dread and detest all such sacrilegious homage, more than any reproaches or injuries whatever. They ought never to allow their hearers to think of them, in any other light, than "as men of like passions with themselves;" who, having been taught the knowledge of God and of his salvation, are sent to preach it to those who have hitherto been left to "walk in their own ways."—We should show the greatest affection to the persons of men, and bear with many of their mistakes and prejudices, in a candid spirit: but we must not spare decidedly to protest against their delusions and superstitions, which are as ruinous to the soul as the grossest immoralities.—The Lord saw good for a long time to "suffer all nations to walk in their own ways;" and he still is pleased to leave innumerable multitudes to follow lying vanities: this should lead us to thankfulness for our peculiar advantages, and to adore the depth of his unsearchable wisdom and justice; but it should not induce us to palliate the idolatries or impieties of our apostate race; or to neglect doing all that we can to communicate "the Light of life" unto them. God never "left himself without witness," in any place or in any age: his longsuffering, and the exuberant bounty of his providence, towards enemies and rebels, are very wonderful; and they proclaim how worthy he is of universal love and adoration, and how inexcusable man is in his forgetfulness of him, and enmity against him.—The most cogent arguments, the most earnest and affectionate address, nay, the most stupendous miracles, are scarcely sufficient to restrain men from the greatest absurdities, or the vilest abominations: much less can they, without his special grace, convert the hearts of sinners to God and holiness.

V. 19—28. They, who are not established by the grace of God in faith and holiness, are liable to be seduced by ill-designing men from one extreme to another: and to treat those as the worst of malefactors, whom just before they were ready to honour as more than men. This should warn us not to desire or value popularity, or human applause; but to "seek that honour alone, which cometh from" the unchangeable "God." Safety, life, breath, and comfort are entirely at his disposal: and if we have experienced his protection and consolation, in the midst of perils and afflictions; we shall be the better able to "confirm the souls" of weak believers, to exhort them "to continue in the faith," and to animate them to press forward in the way to heaven; though they must pass thither through much tribulation. (Note, Rev. 7: 13—17.)—When proper means have been used, and regulations made, for the edification of new converts, and infant churches; we may confidently commend them, with fasting and prayer, to that faithful, gracious, and powerful Lord, "in whom they have believed," in case we be compelled to leave them, either by removing to another situation, or by death.—If zealous ministers are made useful to souls, they think little of hardships and trials.—Those who have joined in prayer for a blessing on their labours, will be glad and thankful, to hear them rehearse all which God has done with them: and all, who love the Lord Jesus and their fellow-sinners, will rejoice to hear, that he has "opened the door of faith" to those who before were strangers to him and his salvation.—But, if this meeting of the messengers of salvation with those by whom "they had been recommended to the grace of God, for the work which they fulfilled," was a season of lively joy and gratitude; what will be that meeting, when apostles, evangelists, missionaries, and all who concurred in sending them, or helped them forward, or prayed for them, with all those who eventually derived benefit from their labours, shall assemble before the throne, with unalloyed love, gratitude, and joy, to render praises to their gracious Lord, for all that he has done by them, for them, or in answer to their prayers.

NOTES.—CHAP. XV. V. 1—6. It is probable, that the events recorded in this chapter took place about seventeen years after St. Paul's conversion; but some expositors date them three years earlier. (Note, Gal. 2:1—5.)—The persons, who taught the Gentile converts at Antioch, that they "could not be saved," unless they were circumcised and observed the whole ceremonial law, came from Judea, and professed to speak the sentiments of the apostles and church at Jerusalem: but they were "false brethren, who came in privily to spy out" and destroy Christian liberty. Their confident decision on the subject could not but prove a great discouragement and temptation to the Gentile converts, and an immense hinderance to the success of the gospel: at the same time, it tended to false sentiments concerning justification, and would eventually have been subversive of genuine Christianity. (Marg. Ref. a—d. Notes, Gal. 1:6—10. 3:1—5. 5:1—6.) For these and similar reasons, Paul and Barnabas vigorously opposed them, and used all their authority, and every proper argument to satisfy the minds of the people, and to silence the false teachers: yet this did not suffice. It was therefore determined, that they should go up to Jerusalem and refer the matter to the apostles and elders; that by their authority and influence, the controversy might be terminated and the peace of the church preserved. (Marg. Ref. f—h.) The apostle informs us, that "he went up, by revelation;" the Lord having made it known to him, or to some of the prophets residing there, that he would have him do so. (Notes, Ex. 18:17—26.) Accordingly, he and Barnabas set out on their journey, being attended part of the way by the pastors, or principal persons, of the church; who thus showed their respect to them, and the pleasure which they took in their company, and who probably bore their expenses: and as they passed through Phenicia and Samaria, they gave a particular account, to the Christians there, of the conversion of the Gentiles, both at Antioch and in the provinces of Asia, which greatly rejoiced them. (Marg. Ref

7 And when there had been [u]much disputing, Peter rose up, and said unto them, Men and brethren, [x]ye know how that a good while ago [y]God made choice among us, that the Gentiles [z]by my mouth should hear the word of the gospel, and believe.

8 And God, [a]which knoweth the hearts, [b]bare them witness, [c]giving them the Holy Ghost, even as he did unto us;

9 And [d]put no difference between us and them, [e]purifying their hearts by faith.

10 Now therefore [f]why tempt ye God, to [g]put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples, [h]which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear?

11 But we believe [i]that, through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, we shall be saved, even as they. [Practical Observations.]

12 ¶ Then all the multitude kept silence, and gave audience to Barnabas and Paul, [k]declaring what miracles and wonders God had wrought among the Gentiles by them.

13 ¶ And [l]after they had held their peace, [m]James answered, saying, [n]Men and brethren, hearken unto me:

14 [o]Simeon hath [p]declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles, [q]to take out of them a people for his name.

15 And [r]to this agree the words of the prophets; as it is written,

16 After [s]this I will return, and will [t]build again the tabernacle of David which is fallen down; and I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up;

17 That [u]the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all [x]the Gentiles upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord, [y]who doeth all these things.

18 [z]Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world.

19 Wherefore my sentence is, [a]that we trouble not them which from among the Gentiles are [b]turned to God:

!—o.) In like manner when they came to Jerusalem, the church, with the apostles and elders, welcomed them; and there they declared, more fully than they had before heard, what "God had done" by their ministry. But though these glad tidings gave general satisfaction; yet some of the Pharisees, who had embraced the gospel, but who still retained an undue regard for the ceremonial law, contended that they ought to comply with its precepts. As therefore there was not an entire agreement upon the subject, it was judged expedient for the apostles, elders, and others of the church, to meet together, and to give the important subject a full discussion, in order that it might be finally determined to the satisfaction of all concerned in it. (Marg. Ref. p—t.)—'I know not any reason to conclude, that their inspiration' (that of the apostles) 'was always so instantaneous and express, as to supersede any deliberation in their own minds, or any consultation with each other.' Doddridge.—This has commonly been called "The first general council;" and it seems to have also been the last, where it could properly be said, "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us, &c." V. 7—11. It is probable that several of the elders on both sides spoke with great earnestness on the subject, before the apostles gave their sentiments, and brought the matter to a determination. Indeed, it is not certain that any of the apostles were present, except Peter, James, and John: perhaps the rest were employed in preaching the gospel at a distance. (Note, Gal. 2:6—10, v. 9.) Those present, however, chose rather to hear the arguments of their brethren, and to show the ground on which their own conclusions rested, than to decide the question merely by apostolical authority. But at length Peter arose, and reminded the assembly, that some years before, God had expressly chosen him, from among the whole company, and directed him to preach the gospel to Cornelius and his company, that they might be brought to believe in Christ: and the heart-searching God had borne witness to the truth and acceptableness of their faith, by the gift of the Holy Spirit; even as he had done to the believing Jews: putting no difference between them, "having purified their hearts by faith." (Marg. Ref. u—d. Notes, 10:3—16,44—48. 11:1—18. 1 Chr. 28:4—6. Matt. 16:19.)—"The heart" may here signify the soul, with all its faculties and powers; and the expression may refer, not only to the sanctification of the soul by the Holy Spirit, but also to the purifying of the conscience through the blood of Christ from the guilt of sin. (Marg. Ref. e. Note, Heb. 9:11—14. 1 Pet. 1—22.) Having received this internal purification, through faith in Christ, they did not want the legal purifications, which were types and shadows of these substantial blessings; and as God had, in this first extraordinary case, decided the question; why should his ministers again put it to the trial, as if they would tempt him to impose so heavy a yoke on the Gentile converts? This did not relate merely to circumcision, but to the whole ceremonial law; which, though proper and useful for the time, required so many distinctions, burdensome purifications, expensive sacrifices, long journeys, and other things of a similar nature; that it was a very uneasy yoke, in every age, even to the inhabitants of the promised land, and still more to those Jews who resided in other countries: and, while it served to prevent idolatry from being universal, it also tended exceedingly to prevent the general diffusion of true religion. (Marg. Ref. f—h.)—'Though these words are by most interpreters applied to the numerous ritual precepts, the costly sacrifices, and the frequent tedious journeys up to Jerusalem, required by the law, which made the observance of it difficult and irksome; I would rather refer them to that defect, that the apostle hath observed in it, that it could "not purge the conscience from the guilt of sin; (Heb. 9:9. 10:1.) that it "could not give life," (Gal. 3:21.) that it was a killing letter, leaving them under condemnation; (2 Cor. 3:6—9.) and so making it necessary for them to believe in Christ, that they might be justified, (Gal. 2:16.) and redeemed from the curse of the law; (Gal. 3:13.) according to those words of the apostle, 13:38,39. ... For to this sense the following words incline; "we could not bear this yoke; for we believe that by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ we shall be saved."' Whitby.—There was, however, no occasion to impose this yoke upon the Gentiles, as even the Jewish converts did not expect to be saved, in any degree, by observing the Mosaic law, but merely by faith in Christ, exactly in the same manner with their Gentile brethren: though they deemed it a part of their present duty to observe it. (Marg. Ref. i. Note, Gal. 2:11—16.) Our believing fathers in old times were saved by faith in a Messiah that was to come, of which the ceremonies were types, sacramental signs, and means of grace: but Christ being come, we shall be saved by him, without those ceremonies.

(Notes, 21:17—26.) "All the multitude," must therefore here be restricted to the whole of the assembly convened for this special purpose, (perhaps including select persons who were not elders,) the determination of which assembly was afterwards made known to the church at large, who concurred in it. (Note, 22—29.)—The miracles, which God wrought by the apostles, when they were preaching to the Gentiles, attested his approbation of their conduct, and proved that they did right, in not requiring the converts to be circumcised. V. 13—18. When Paul and Barnabas had concluded their narrative, the apostle James closed the conference. He first referred them to the account given by Simeon, (2 Pet. 1:1. Gr.) or Simon Peter, of the manner in which God first visited the Gentiles in mercy, to take from among them a people, to worship and glorify his name: and he showed them, that, though this was contrary to the prejudices of many among them, yet it accorded with the predictions of the prophets, as, for instance, of a remarkable prophecy by Amos. (Marg. Ref. l—r. Note, Am. 9:11,12.) It was therefore told, that the tabernacle of David would fall and long lie in ruins: but afterwards God promised to raise it up, and build again those ruins. Then all the enemies of the church, represented by Edom, would be subjected; and a remnant of men, even of all the nations, would seek the Lord, and "his name would be called upon them."—This the Lord had undertaken to perform: and as all his works were "known to him from the beginning of the world," he was now evidently accomplishing his plan, which he had before arranged, and of some parts of which he had given previous intimations. (Marg. Ref. s—z. Notes, 2:22—24. 4:23—28. 17:26—29.)—After this, &c. (16,17.) The quotation varies from the LXX, and still more from the Hebrew. V. 19—21. On the ground before stated, James gave it as his decided opinion, that the Gentile converts ought not to be molested about circumcision, or the ritual law; but that it might be expedient and proper, to point out to them some particulars, which they would do well to observe. He then proposed to write to them that they should abstain from meats, which had been offered to idols, and polluted in that worship, that they might decidedly show their entire renunciation and abhorrence of idolatry; (Marg. Ref. a—c. Notes, 1 Cor. 8:7—13. 10:18—33.) and also to caution them against fornication. This was by no means held in such abhorrence among the Gentiles, as it ought to have been; nay, it was generally considered as a trivial matter: and as it was very closely connected with their idolatrous feasts, the new converts might be in peculiar danger of being seduced into it; to the dishonour of their profession, the injury of their own souls, and the great detriment of domestic comfort, and union in the worship of God. (Marg. Ref. d.) This was no doubt a moral injunction, independent of the ceremonial law. So was likewise the prohibition to eat of things sacrificed to idols as connected with its consequences; being in reality communion with idolaters in idolatry: and no doubt it is in force at this day, as a command of the moral law; and must be charged on the consciences of all such as live among idolaters.—The subsequent injunctions are of another nature, and enforced by other reasons. The law of Moses had long been published in the several cities, where the gospel was then planted, being "read in their synagogues every Sabbath;" the people therefore every where knew, that the eating of blood was prohibited very strictly. This prohibition was given from reverence to the blood of the sacrifices, which, being the life of the animal, was the essence of the atonement, as typical of that of Christ. It would then have needlessly grieved and stumbled the Jewish converts, and prevented their friendly intercourse with their brethren, and further prejudiced the unconverted Jews against the gospel; if the Gentile converts had shown so open a disregard to the solemn sacrifices, which were still offered at the temple. This seems to have been the reason of this restriction. (Marg. Ref. e, f.) As long as the sacrifices continued to be offered, we may suppose that it was observed: but "as every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused;" as there is no intimation to this effect in the apostolical epistles; and as the reason of it, which is here annexed, has long since ceased; so we must conclude that we are left as free in this, as in other similar matters. (Note, 1 Tim. 4:1—5.) The permission given to the Israelites to sell the bodies of animals which died of themselves, to their heathen neighbours; shows, that the restriction of eating of blood was ceremonial, not moral. They would not have been allowed to tempt the Gentiles to immorality. (Notes, Lev. 17:10—16. Deut. 14:21.)—It has been observed by several persons, that if Peter, instead of James, had said, "My sentence is," it would have given a more plausible argument for Peter's supremacy, than any which the Papists can adduce.

V. 22—29. In order to authenticate their decision more fully, the apostles, and elders, and brethren, thought good to select two eminent or leading persons among them, to go with Paul and Barnabas to Antioch. By them they wrote circular letters, not only in the name of the apostles and elders, but of the whole church, to whom the decision of the assembly was made known, and in which all concurred, to the Christian at Antioch, and Syria, and Cilicia; in which they doubtless meant to include all those churches that were established in other cities. In these, they acknowledged the Gentile converts as "brethren;" and by this term saluted them; and they disowned those persons who had gone out from them, to trouble them with their doctrine, and to subvert the foundations of their faith and hope. (Marg. Ref. l—o. Notes, 1 —6. Gal. 1:6—10. 2:1—5. 5:1—12. 6:11—16.) They had therefore unanimously agreed, when met together, to send two other brethren, namely, Barsabas, and Silas or Silvanus, leading men in the church, (Marg. Ref. i, k.) along with Paul and Barnabas, (whom they greatly loved and honoured, as men who had ventured their lives for the name of Christ,) to inform them of the same things by word of mouth, and to explain them more fully if requisite. For, being warranted to declare themselves directed by the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit, they were assured, that "it seemed good to him," as well as to them, to impose on them no other burden, than the things before mentioned; which were indeed necessary, either on their own account, and in respect of present circumstances; and in attending to them they would do well, and be accepted of God. (Marg. Ref. p—f.)—Many suppose, that the determination of God, in the case of Cornelius, was exclusively referred to: but it can hardly be supposed, that the apostles and council were left without a satisfactory consciousness, in a matter of such peculiar importance, that they were guided in the decision by the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit. We may suppose from the harmonious conclusion of the business, that those who at first were of another opinion were at length convinced; and made no further opposition to the general determination of this question. (Note, 16:4,5.)

V. 30—35. This epistle, when read at Antioch, settled the dispute in that city, and rejoiced the hearts of the disciples: and the ministry of Judas and Silas, who were prophets of considerable authority in the church, and of eminent gifts, and spake fully and freely on the subject, conduced greatly to establish them in the faith. (Marg. Ref. g—m. Notes, 1:23—26, v. 23. 11:27—30.) So that Silas, having formed an intimate friendship with Paul, and being delightfully employed, did not choose to return with Judas; having a prospect of greater usefulness at Antioch, and perhaps having an eye to that service, which he afterwards performed. (Marg. Ref. n, o.)—Being prophets, &c. (32) 'That is, saith Dr. Hammond, being two bishops of Judea: but if so, why "pleased it Silas to abide there still;" "rather than go back to his charge?" Yea, why after so long a stay at Antioch, doth he go along with Paul in his travels, through Syria and Cilicia, "confirming the churches?" (41) Why do we find him still with Paul; (16: 17: 18:) and preaching at Thessalonica, Corinth, and other places; but not at all returning to his see? Whitby.

V. 36—41. The primary view of Paul, in proposing to Barnabas another journey into those distant regions, was, to revisit the churches which they had planted, and see whether they went on prosperously, and to confirm and edify them: but doubtless he meant also to seek further opportunities of spreading the gospel. (Marg. Ref. r—t.)—Barnabas seems to have been too partial to his nephew; and perhaps Paul was too severe with him. (Note, 13:13—15.) Doubtless they were both betrayed into undue warmth and pertinacity; which shows the remains of human depravity in the hearts of the best of men: and the impartiality of the inspired historian, in recording it, is worthy of notice. (Marg. Ref. u—y.)—It has indeed been maintained, that, though both were angry, neither of them sinned: but if the one was angry without cause, or above cause, or expressed his anger unduly, he sinned; and if the other gave him just cause, he doubtless sinned. Certainly this never could have occurred, if both had been perfect.—Thus these two fellow-labourers parted, probably to meet no more on earth: neither of them, however, remitted any thing of his zeal and diligence, on account of this disagreement; or said any thing that we know of, to disparage the other: so that two missions were sent forth instead of one, both of which it is probable were "recommended to God," by the prayers of the brethren: yet the language here used seems more directly applicable to Paul, whose conduct on this occasion was most approved. (Marg. Ref. b—d.) We read nothing further in the history concerning Barnabas; who went first to Cyprus, where he and Paul first preached, when they set out from Antioch. (Notes, 13:4—12. 1 Cor. 9:6. Gal. 2:6—10.) Doubtless he laboured and prospered to the end of his life; but the rest of this book relates primarily to the ministry and sufferings of St. Paul and his companions.—And Cilicia. (41) This and the twenty-third verse contain the only intimation of any church being found in Cilicia, the native country of St. Paul. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1- 11. The great enemy of God and man is continually devising measures for obstructing the success of the gospel. For this purpose, he endeavours to make divisions among those who preach and profess it; (Notes, and P. O. 6:1—7.) and to corrupt its purity, and obscure the glory of divine grace in it, by plausibly substituting another foundation; or by introducing such alterations or appendages, as are calculated to mislead or discourage unestablished inquirers. (Notes, 1 Cor. 3:10—15. Gal. 1:6—10.) In these attempts he avails himself of the errors, bigotry, and prejudices of well-meaning persons, and of the ambition and selfishness of false brethren. —Wise and good men will avoid disputation as far as they can; yet they should not determine against all controversy, or condemn it indiscriminately: for when false teachers "come in unawares" to "subvert men's souls;" when the fundamental truths of the gospel are opposed or perverted, and the principles of men are poisoned by pernicious tenets; we ought to "contend earnestly" (though in meekness) "for the faith once delivered to the saints:" and to decline controversy in these circumstances, argues lukewarmness and cowardice, rather than meekness and wisdom. (Notes, Jude 3,4.)—When fair argument and scriptural evidence fail to convince gainsayers; we must be careful, that we be not seduced to use improper means of conducting the disputation: and if any method of preserving peace and truth can be suggested, we should submit to very great personal inconvenience, or apparent degradation, to accomplish so desirable an end. Sometimes the opinion of those "who seem to be pillars," will go further than arguments: and we may fairly, in such circumstances, appeal to their judgment, in order to "stop the mouths" of those who profess to speak their sentiments; and to satisfy such as have imbibed prejudices, which close their minds to the most conclusive reasoning. But we ought never to be so engaged about any single question, as to neglect opportunities of declaring what God has done for or by us, or of being helpers to the joy of our brethren in every place.—It may be useful for the ministers and disciples of Christ, to meet together, to consider any controverted subject, in order that they may form the more accurate and decided judgment upon it: yet great humility, prudence, temper, candour, and integrity are requisite, to prevent such conventions from degenerating into party cabals, or scenes of contention and confusion. This has brought ecclesiastical councils and synods into general disrepute: and indeed little good can be expected from them when they are very numerous; or when they are so constituted, as to give an opening for political contests, or party interests. Yet, select companies meeting in the fear of God, and in the spirit of humble prayer for divine teaching, may help each other to investigate truth, and to decide difficult and important questions. We should, however, remember that the apostles themselves assigned the reasons of their determinations; and did not require the elders and churches to submit to their authority, without knowing the grounds on which they went: and in such discussions, we shall generally, if not always, find, that by examining the source of the subject in question, it will appear to have been already decided by the Lord himself: and that it would be "tempting" him to debate the matter any further —We "sinners of the Gentiles" have great cause to bless God, that we have heard the gospel. May we have that faith which the great Searcher of hearts approves, and attests by the seal of the Holy Spirit! Then our hearts and consciences will be purified from the pollution and guilt of sin; and we shall not want any of those burdensome superstitions, which many have attempted to impose "on the necks of the disciples," instead of the abrogated ceremonial law. Those ordinances which God has appointed as means of grace to our souls, and of rendering him the worship due to his name, we shall delight in attending on; accounting his service perfect freedom, and the Redeemer's yoke easy and pleasant: and we shall adopt or reject merely circumstantial

CHAPTER XVI.

Paul and Silas come to Derbe and Lystra, and Paul, having circumcised Timothy, takes him for an assistant, 1—3. They deliver the apostolic decree to the churches, which are established, and increased in numbers, 4, 5. Having gone through Phrygia and Galatia, the Spirit forbids them to preach in Asia and Bithynia, and they come to Troas, 6—8. A vision directs them to go into Macedonia, and they arrive at Philippi, 9—12. Lydia, being converted, entertains them, 13—15. Paul casts out a spirit of divination, 16—18; and, in consequence, he and Silas are seized, scourged, imprisoned, and put in the stocks, 19—24. They pray and sing praises; and an earthquake opens the doors of the prison, and looses their bonds, 25, 26. The jailer, prevented by Paul from killing himself, is converted, with his family, 27—34. Paul and Silas, being set at liberty, refuse to leave the prison, till requested by the magistrates, 35—39. They comfort the brethren, and depart, 40.

THEN came he [a]to Derbe and Lystra: and, behold, a certain disciple was there, [b]named Timotheus, the son of a certain woman, [c]which was a Jewess, and believed; [d]but his father was a Greek:

2 Which [e]was well reported of by the brethren that were at Lystra and [f]Iconium.

3 Him [g]would Paul have to go forth with him; [h]and took and circumcised him, because of the Jews which were in those quarters: for they knew all that his father was a Greek.

4 And as they went through the cities, [i]they delivered them the decrees for to keep, that were ordained of the apostles and elders which were at Jerusalem.

5 And [k]so were the churches established in the faith, [l]and increased in number daily.

6 Now, when they had gone throughout [m]Phrygia, and [n]the region of Galatia, and were [o]forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the word in [p]Asia,

7 After they were come to Mysia, they assayed to go into [q]Bithynia: but the Spirit suffered them not.

8 And they, passing by Mysia, came down to [r]Troas.

regulations, as they appear to promote edification, or the contrary. We shall however place no dependence on any of these things; believing that "we shall be saved by the grace of the Lord Jesus," even as these primitive Christians were.

V. 12—31. That is undoubtedly the way of eternal life, to which God of old affixed the seal of miracles, which he confirms to us by the testimony of prophets and apostles, and which he blesses for the conversion of sinners in every age and nation. Thus he at first "visited the Gentiles, to take a people from among them" for the honour of "his name:" and thus is he building the tabernacle, and setting up the kingdom, of "the Son of David," in every part of the earth. He, "who doeth all these things," carries on his work according to "the counsel of his own will;" (Note, Eph. 1:9—12, v. 11.) for "known unto him are all his works, from the beginning of the world:" his providential dispensations illustrate and fulfil his word; and it does not behoove us to attempt to modify his operations, in conformity with our limited or prejudiced apprehensions. We should not therefore "trouble" those about forms or notions, who are evidently turned unto God; much less ought we to impose on them by authority or as necessary to salvation, such things as never, at any time, could plead a divine sanction. It may, however, be proper to warn them to keep at a distance from all occasions, or appearances, of those evils to which they were before most addicted, or to which they are now most likely to be tempted; and strenuously to caution them to use their Christian liberty, with such moderation and prudence, as the good of their brethren, their friendly intercourse with them, and the success of the gospel may render expedient. (Notes, Rom. 14:1—6, 3—23. 15:1—3. Gal. 5:13—15. 1 Pet. 2:13—17.)—Those who possess influence and authority should support their faithful brethren, whose usefulness may be hindered by the prejudices gone forth against them: they should embrace opportunities of decidedly speaking in commendation of upright characters; and against those, "who trouble" the church, and "subvert men's souls:" and, if other things are equal, those persons who have ventured and suffered the most for the name of the Lord Jesus, are entitled to the most respect and affection from their brethren.

V. 32—41. Unanimity among ministers and Christians gives great weight to their determinations: what they do with one accord, may often be considered as the mind and work of the Holy Spirit; especially when their counsels and measures are evidently consonant to Scripture, and conducive to the peace and purity of the church; and when the whole is managed in the spirit of unassuming love: but arbitrary injunctions, and vindictive anathemas, have long distinguished the proceedings of antichristian councils, from those of this Christian synod.—Instructions, arguments, and exhortations, are the proper means of producing conviction and obedience, and of confirming men in the faith: and Christian liberty, soberly explained and used, is conducive to consolation and gratitude.—While we approve and imitate the zeal, love, and indefatigable diligence and courage of the apostles, in proposing to revisit the churches, where they had been so persecuted; we must also note the effects of human imperfection in the best of men; that we may watch and pray against all occasions of contention, and all sharpness and pertinacity in contending with our brethren. Yet we should also admire the wisdom of God, in disappointing the devices of the enemy, and overruling even the infirmity of apostles, to promote the cause of the gospel: and we should copy their example, in not allowing any personal differences to take us off from the work, to which the Lord has severally called us; to render us negligent or unfaithful in it; or induce us to say or do any thing, to lessen the character, or obstruct the usefulness, of those faithful and zealous labourers, who, in some things, differ from us.

NOTES.—CHAP. XVI. V. 1—3. Barnabas having sailed to the island Cyprus, Paul and Silas journeyed by land, through Syria, into Asia Minor; exercising their ministry as they passed along, both in Syria and Cilicia. (Notes, 15:36—41.) At length they arrived at Derbe, and Lystra, where they found Timothy, who was already a disciple. He had been piously educated, and made acquainted with the Scriptures from his youth; (Notes, 2 Tim. 1:3—5. 3:14—17.) and he had been brought to believe in Christ, when Paul and Barnabas were before at Lystra. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, 14:19,20. 1 Tim. 1:1,2.)—"Being well reported of" by his Christian brethren, and endowed with very promising abilities, Paul purposed that he should accompany him in his travels and labours: but, as his father was an uncircumcised Gentile, it was known, that he had not been circumcised in his infancy; and he therefore judged it expedient for him to receive circumcision, previous to his entrance on his public ministry. (Marg. Ref. d—h.) Not that this was at all needful for him as a Gentile convert; or that the apostle thought the Jewish believers were bound to observe the ceremonial law; but lest the knowledge of his Father, as a Gentile, should prejudice the Jews in the adjacent cities against Paul and his ministry; if they had supposed that he had taken an uncircumcised person, to be his intimate companion and assistant: and it would likewise exclude Timothy from preaching in the synagogues, for which he seems to have been peculiarly qualified. He therefore thus far condescended to the prejudices of the Jews: though some time before at Jerusalem, he would not agree to the circumcision of Titus, when it was considered as requisite for salvation. (Notes, Gal. 2:1—5.)—'After this, Paul laid his hands upon him, and set him apart for the ministerial office, conferring on him extraordinary gifts, (2 Tim. 1:6.) which were attended with prophecies of his future usefulness. (1 Tim. 1:18. 4:14.) ... He' (the apostle) 'always openly avowed, that the Gentiles were free from the yoke of the Mosaic ceremonies, and that the Jews were not to expect salvation by them; and he also taught that they were not in conscience bound to observe them at all, except in cases where the omission of them would give offence.' Doddridge.—Grotius observes, that this was probably the beginning of Luke's acquaintance with Timothy, 'though Paul knew him long before.'—The apostle's manner, in speaking of the persecutions which he endured "at Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra, &c.;" though, before he wrote it, he had gone through very many others; implies that Timothy had witnessed his sufferings in that neighbourhood, and would be peculiarly affected by recollecting them. (Note, 2 Tim. 3:10—12.)

'As they passed through the several cities of those regions, that peace might be secured among the brethren, and no unnecessary burden laid upon the Gentile converts, they delivered to their custody an exact and attested copy of the decrees, which were determined as a rule for their direction by the apostles and elders that were assembled in full council at Jerusalem. The several churches therefore, where they came, being watered by such faithful labourers, and encouraged with so favourable a decision of the grand point in question, were much confirmed in their adherence to the Christian faith, and increased more and more in numbers daily.' Doddridge (*Marg. V. 6—12. It seems to have been at this time, that Paul preached so successfully at Galatia, as to found those flourishing churches, to which he afterwards wrote his epistle.

9 ¶ And a vision appeared to Paul in the night: There stood a man of [t]Macedonia, and prayed him, saying, [u]Come over into Macedonia, and help us.

10 And after he had seen the vision, [x]immediately we endeavoured to go into Macedonia, assuredly gathering that the Lord had called us for to preach the gospel unto them.

11 Therefore loosing from Troas, we came with a straight course to Samothracia, and the next day to Neapolis;

12 And from thence to [y]Philippi, which is [z]the chief city of that part of Macedonia, and [a]a colony: and we were in that city abiding certain days. [Practical Observations.]

13 And [a]on the [b]sabbath he went out of the city by a river-side, [c]where prayer was wont to be made; [d]and we sat down, and [d]spake unto the women which resorted thither.

14 ¶ And a certain woman named [e]Lydia, a seller of purple, of the city of [f]Thyatira, which [g]worshipped God, heard us: [h]whose heart the Lord opened, that she attended unto the things which were spoken of Paul.

15 And [i]when she was baptized, and her household, she besought us, saying, [k]If ye have judged me to be faithful to the Lord, [l]come into my house, and abide there. [m]And she constrained us.

16 ¶ And it came to pass, [n]as we went to prayer, a certain damsel [o]possessed with a spirit of [p]divination met us, [q]which brought her masters much gain by soothsaying:

17 The same followed Paul and us, and cried, saying, [r]These men are [s]the servants of [t]the most high God, which show unto us [u]the way of salvation.

18 And this did she many days. But Paul, [v]being grieved, turned and said to the spirit, [x]I command thee in the name of Jesus Christ to come out of her. And he came out the same hour.

(Marg. Ref. n. Notes, 18:18—23. Preface to Galatians.) He probably intended to go regularly from place to place in that neighbourhood, planting the gospel as he proceeded; but, by an immediate revelation, the Holy Spirit forbade him to preach in the province of Asia, or in Bithynia; these were distinct parts of Asia Minor, in which the several cities and regions, mentioned in the preceding chapters, were situated. (Marg. Ref. o—q. Notes, 19:8—12, v. 10. 1 Pet. 1:1,2.)—It was the will of God, that the apostle and his companions should proceed to a still greater distance from Judea: in the mean time the gospel would be gradually diffusing its influence in those parts, by other means; and we find that, soon after, flourishing churches were established in those very places where the apostle and his fellow-labourers were at that time forbidden to preach. They therefore went on to Troas, on the coast of the Egean Sea: and, while they were waiting at that city, to know the will of God concerning them; Paul had a vision of a Macedonian, who, as a humble supplicant, said, "Passing over into Macedonia, assist us:" from which it was assuredly concluded, that they were commanded to cross the sea into Europe, in order that they might preach the gospel to the inhabitants of Macedonia. Accordingly, they took ship, and passed by the usual course to Philippi, which was a principal city, if not the chief city, in that division of Macedonia; and a Roman colony, being chiefly inhabited by Roman citizens, who had various privileges, and were governed by their own laws. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. r—y.)—The historian on this occasion begins to speak in the first person plural, saying, "We endeavoured, &c.;" (10) hence we learn that he attended Paul in this voyage, and probably in most of his subsequent labours; though he modestly avoided mentioning any thing particular concerning himself.—The Spirit, &c. (7) Some manuscripts, and many ancient versions and citations read, "the Spirit of Jesus." The language used, in speaking of the Spirit, is personal and authoritative.—A man, &c. (9) Some think that the apostle knew the person, who appeared to him in vision, to be a Macedonian, by his dress or language; and others suppose, that he resembled some one with whom Paul was acquainted.—It does not appear from the history, that any of the Macedonians were previously inquiring after salvation, (as Cornelius had been,) or disposed to seek direction and help. But the Lord purposed to call many of them by his grace, and directed his servants, by this vision, to the proper means of accomplishing his gracious designs. (Note, 18:9—11.)—Colony. (12) 'The critics were long puzzled to find any mention of Philippi, as a Roman colony: but some coins (dug up, I think, within the last century) show, that a colony was planted there by Julius Cæsar, and afterwards much augmented by Augustus.' Doddridge.

V. 13—15. This is the first account, transmitted to us, of the gospel being preached in Europe: though the church at Rome, it is probable, was planted considerably before this time. (Preface to Romans.)—There were Jews residing in most if not all of the cities which the apostles and evangelists visited; though they appear to have been only a few at Philippi. It seems they had not a synagogue, with rulers: but there was a small oratory without the city, by the river-side, where a few people were accustomed to assemble, for the worship of God, on the sabbath-days. (Note, Luke 6:12.) Thither the apostle and his friends went, and took the opportunity of discoursing to "the women who resorted thither," concerning the gospel of Christ: for, it does not appear, that there were any other men in the assembly. (Marg. Ref. a —d.)—Among the rest, there was a native of Thyatira, a city of Asia, who at this time resided at Philippi, to traffic in purple cloths, which were then in great estimation. She seems to have been of Gentile extraction, but proselyted to the Jewish religion: and the Lord was pleased to "open her heart" to attend unto the things which were spoken of Paul, and to believe his doctrine. This implies, that pride, prejudice, the love of sin, and the love of the world, close the heart against the truths of God; till his grace makes way for admission of them into the understanding and affections. (Marg. Ref. e—h. Notes, Ps. 119:18. Luke 24:44—49, v. 44.) Thus she was led to embrace the gospel, and was baptized, with her household; the adult part of which no doubt were instructed in Christianity, along with her. There is no proof that there were any children in her family, though it is probable there were: the Syriac version indeed renders it, "the children of her house;" but this only shows the sentiments of those who made that early translation: and the language here used seems not capable of being consistently used in the narratives of those who reject infant baptism. (Note, 29—34.)—After this Lydia besought the apostle and his company, if they really considered her to be a true believer, to lodge in her house; for, probably, they had before been very poorly accommodated: and by her urgent invitations she overcame their reluctance to put her to so much trouble and expense. By this it appears that she was a person rather in affluent circumstances.—Many others seem, about this time, or soon afterwards, to have been converted. (Preface to Philippians.)—Opened. (14) 'By the grace of God she received the faith.' Hammond.—'To open the ear, or the heart, is a phrase used to signify the rendering any person willing or inclined to do any thing. Ps. 40:7.' Whitby. V. 16—18. As the apostle and his friends went from the house of Lydia to the oratory above mentioned; (Note, 13—15.) they were met by a female slave, who was instigated and enabled by an evil spirit to utter ambiguous predictions, or divinations, after the manner of the priestesses of the Pythian Apollo. Thus she had acquired great reputation, as a kind of oracle, or fortune-teller, for making wonderful discoveries; which were probably accompanied by various agitations and distortions of body, and a peculiar kind of voice and articulation: for these were common on such occasions. By this practice she brought her masters a considerable gain, and became very valuable to them. (Marg. Ref. n—p.) But being excited by the evil spirit, who desired to discredit, and bring into suspicion, the ministry and miracles of the apostle and his coadjutors, she cried aloud, "These are the servants of the most High God, who show to us the way of salvation." For some days Paul waited, perhaps to see in what manner the Lord would silence so disgraceful a testimony to his truth: at length, being grieved by the damsel's perseverance, he cast out the evil spirit by the power of Christ; and she returned to the full possession of her faculties, so that she could utter no more divinations: perhaps she was converted to Chris-

19 ¶ And when her masters saw that [r]the hope of their gains was gone, [s]they caught Paul and Silas, and drew them into the [t]market-place unto the rulers,

20 And brought them to the magistrates, saying, These men, [u]being Jews, [v]do exceedingly trouble our city, 21 And teach [w]customs, which are not lawful for us to receive, neither to observe, being Romans.

22 And [x]the multitude rose up together against them; [y]and the magistrates rent off their clothes, and commanded to beat them.

23 And when they had laid many stripes upon them, [z]they cast them into prison, charging the jailer [a]to keep them safely:

24 Who, having received such a charge, thrust them into [b]the inner prison, [c]and made their feet fast in the stocks. [Practical Observations.]

25 ¶ And [d]at midnight Paul and Silas [e]prayed, and [f]sang praises unto God: [g]and the prisoners heard them.

26 And [h]suddenly there was a great earthquake, so that the foundations of the prison were shaken: and immediately all the doors were opened, [i]and every one's bands were loosed.

27 And [k]the keeper of the prison awaking out of his sleep, and seeing the prison-doors open, [l]he drew out his sword, and would have killed himself, supposing that the prisoners had been fled.

28 But Paul [m]cried with a loud voice, saying, [n]Do thyself no harm; for we are all here.

tianity. (Marg. Ref. q—x. Notes, Mark 1:23—28,34.)—This transaction demonstrates, beyond all controversy, that such pretensions are not always human impostures, but are sometimes real satanical operations. Had this damsel's divination been a mere juggle between her and her masters, the command of the apostle could not have detected it, or prevented them from carrying on the deception: nor could he at once, or indeed at all, have convinced the whole multitude, and the city in general, that it was a mere imposture; for men are by no means easily undeceived in matters of this nature. And if mere jugglers had been convinced, that Paul and his friends were indeed "the servants of the true God," and teachers of the way of salvation; they would never have ventured to address them in this manner.—But, as the woman was really instigated, and in a sense inspired, by an evil spirit; and as, in the paroxysms of her distraction, and amidst strange and wild actions and gestures, she actually uttered such things as were apparent prophecies and wonderful discoveries; such as Satan could at any time make, by his foresight, and conjectural knowledge, if God would permit him; (Note, Deut. 13:1—5.) the change was manifest, when the dispossession took place; and all concerned were fully satisfied, that she could divine no longer, and that it was in vain to apply to her for that purpose.

V. 19—24. The owners of this damsel, being sensible that no further lucre could be made by her, and that her value, if offered to sale, was greatly diminished, were exceedingly exasperated by their loss: and when they had seized on Paul and Silas, and accused them before the magistrates as disturbers of the peace, and teachers of unlawful customs; the multitude also, being enraged at the loss of their prophetess, joined in the tumultuous accusation. (Marg. Ref. y—d.) Whereas, had the apostle satisfactorily detected an artful impostor; they who had been convinced of the cheat, would have been enraged at those who had duped them of their money, and not at him who had undeceived them.—It does not appear, that the Jews were forbidden to exercise their religion at Philippi, or in other cities of the Roman empire, at this time; so that the accusation was altogether malicious and groundless. Yet the magistrates, concurring with the popular fury, violently rent off the garments of Paul and Silas; and, having severely scourged them, without any previous trial, they cast them into prison and charged the jailer to keep them safely; as if they had been dangerous and artful criminals, who would certainly effect their escape if possible. And he, being probably a man of a severe temper, and desirous of pleasing his employers, and perhaps despising them on account of their religion, cast them into the inner prison, or the darkest and most noisome part of the dungeon; and there fastened their feet in the stocks, which must have rendered their situation very painful. (Marg. Ref. e—i.) Thus they were left, with their wounds undressed, in the cold and dark dungeon, without any refreshment, to wear away the night, expecting the next day to be further proceeded against. (Note, 1 Thes. 2:1—8.) But neither they, nor any of the persons concerned, thought of that most gracious design, for which the Lord had permitted these sufferings to come on them.—Timothy, and Luke, and the rest of the company, as less noticed, were exempted from this severe trial.—Gone. (19) The same word is used, as before, when the evil spirit went out; 'as if the hope of their gains had removed from them, along with the unclean spirit.' Beza.—Being Jews. (20) The Christians were here confounded with the unconverted Jews, as both protested against the Pagan worship. But, had the worship of JEHOVAH been contrary to any Roman law then in force, and actually carried into execution, no Jews could have remained in any of the cities where colonies were planted. It appears, that some statutes to this effect had been enacted; but doubtless it was generally found impracticable to execute them; and so they became obsolete, except when an occasion was sought of gratifying malice and cruelty by persecution.

V. 25—28. It might have been expected, by those who know not the consolations of God, that Paul and Silas would have vented their feelings in bitter lamentations, and exclamations against the cruelty and injustice of the treatment which they had received. Yet "at midnight," when their wounds and bruises would naturally become doubly painful, they first poured out their hearts in prayer; and doubtless remembered their persecutors, especially the jailer: and, being thus filled with divine consolation, they joyfully sang praises to God, so loudly that the other prisoners heard them. (Marg. Ref. k—n. Note, Jam. 5:13.) At this very time, the Lord was pleased to bear testimony to their innocency, by an extraordinary earthquake, which probably was felt all over the city; but which especially shook the foundations of the prison, burst open all the doors, and in a wonderful manner brake off the bonds and fetters of all the prisoners: and yet no person was hurt by it! Nor does it appear, that any of the prisoners attempted to escape! This tremendous concussion awakened the jailer, who supposing, from the doors being open, that the prisoners, especially Paul and Silas, had fled, was about to murder himself. For he expected to be called to a severe account, and to be disgraced, or put to an ignominious death, for allowing them to escape: (Notes, 12: 5—11,18,19.) and therefore, according to the false notions of honour which then prevailed, and in a mixture of infidelity, pride, and desperation, he was about to plunge himself into eternity, with all his unrepented sins upon his head, by another act of most daring contempt of God, and rebellion against him. But Paul discovering, either by his exclamations, or by a divine monition, what he was about to do, cried out aloud, (being in earnest to save him from destruction, even as if he had been a friend, or brother,) entreating him "to do himself no harm," for he and the other prisoners were there; not having attempted to take advantage of these awful events, nor purposing to do it.

V. 29—34. The friendly address of Paul and Silas to the jailer, connected with the extraordinary interposition of God in their favour, seems to have been made effectual by the Holy Spirit, at once to convince him, that these were indeed "the servants of the most high God;" though probably, he had before derided that pretension, and concurred with those who persecuted them on that account. (Note, 16—18.) Thus he was led to a conviction of his guilt, in treating them with cruelty and contempt, as well as to a sense of his former sins: and he trembled, lest he should immediately be destroyed by the righteous vengeance of God, and sink into misery in another world. Yet remembering, that they came to "show men the way of salvation," he seems to have conceived hopes of that deliverance. Calling, therefore, "for a light," in great haste and terror, he came in and fell down before Paul and Silas: and first, (as a proof that he began to relent and be sorry for his sin,) bringing them out of the stocks and the inner prison, he addressed them in the most respectful manner, saying, Sirs, what must I do to be saved?" By being saved, he doubtless meant deliverance from present death, and from future condemnation. (Marg. Ref. u—a. Note, 24:24—27.)—"He spake thus to them, as knowing, or conceiving, from the words of the Pythoness, that they were appointed to show to others the way of salvation." Whitby. Nor were they reluctant, on account of past injuries, immediately (though an unseasonable hour, and themselves greatly in need of ease and rest) to give instruction and encouragement to him; or led to despair of his salvation, or to prescribe harder terms to him than to others, because of his atrocious crimes: on the contrary, they exhorted him to "believe in the Lord Jesus Christ," and assured him that in doing this he would certainly be saved. (Marg. Ref. b.) This faith implied a belief of their testimony concerning Jesus as the promised Messiah, and concerning his person, character, sufferings, death, resurrection, and ascension; and a reliance on him for all things pertaining to salvation.—They also included his household in this assurance: not that his faith could save them: but his example might lead them to believe in Christ also; and with him they would become a part of the visible church, and have the benefit of the means of grace for their salvation. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, 2:37—40. 11:4—17, v. 14. Gen. 17:7—8. Jer. 32:39—41. Luke 19:1—10, v. 9.)—They then instructed him and all his family more fully in the doctrine of the gospel: and the Lord so blessed the word, that he was immediately humbled, softened, and changed from a lion, as it were, into a lamb; so that he first compassionately washed and dressed their stripes, and then professing faith in Christ, he was baptized in his name; though he might fear the heavy displeasure of the magistrates, for thus embracing the cause which they had set themselves to oppose: and at the same time all his household was baptized likewise. (Marg. Ref. d—f.) Now, therefore, regarding Paul and Silas with the greatest respect and most endeared affection, he brought them into his house, and entertained them at his table. (Marg. Ref. g. Notes, Matt. 10:40—42. 25:34—40. Gal. 5:—16, v. 6. 1 John 3:13—15.) At the same time his trembling was turned into joy.—"He rejoiced with all his house," "having believed in God." (Note, 13—15, v. 15.)—When a Gentile householder was converted to the Jewish religion, all the males in his family, including infants, were circumcised with him, unless any of the adults, after instruction, refused to be so: it is therefore obvious to suppose, that the same rule was observed in the baptism of those households, of which we read in the New Testament; for it has already been shown, that the covenant sealed to Abraham, was the same as the Christian covenant; and that circumcision was the sign of the same blessings, of which baptism now is. (Note, Gen. 17:9—12.) And the language concerning the baptism of believers and their households, so much accords to that concerning the circumcision of Abraham and his household; that, in connexion with other Scriptures; with the general and early use of infant baptism in the primitive church; and with the consideration, that we do not read, in the New Testament, of one single instance in which the children of Christian parents were baptized adult; it must be allowed strongly to countenance the sentiments and practice of pedobaptists; though we suppose, that the change of the initiatory ordinance, as far as infants were concerned, was silently and gradually; like that respecting the Sabbath: the Jewish converts still circumcising their male children, to avoid giving needless offence to the unconverted Jews. (Note, 1—3.)—It seems also most probable, to me at least, that Paul and Silas, in their painful condition, and in the jailer's house, did not baptize him and his family by immersion.

V. 35—40. Perhaps the earthquake, and the reports of what had taken place at the prison, concurred in dismaying the magistrates from proceeding further against Paul and Silas: they were, however, no doubt, conscious that they had done more than they could justify: and they therefore sent their sergeants, or beadles, to give orders to the jailer to release them; which he delivered to them with great joy and affection. (Marg. Ref. k.) But the apostle, though willing to suffer for the cause of Christ, and not at all disposed to avenge himself; judged it proper to remind these iniquitous magistrates, that they had acted illegally, and might be severely punished for it: because this would tend to procure more equitable treatment for the Christians, and indeed for the other citizens, in future. In the tumult of the proceedings against him and Silas, the day before, they had not thought it expedient to plead their privilege as Romans, or no notice had been taken of their plea: but Paul now charged the magistrates with scourging them publicly, and imprisoning them in a cruel and ignominious manner, though they had not been condemned of any crime, and though they could prove themselves Roman citizens. And now they meant to set them at liberty, in an underhand manner, that they might conceal their own injustice. He and Silas, however, did not choose to go away under the imputation of having deserved such punishment: if therefore the magistrates desired that they should depart, they must come themselves, acknowledge their fault, and dismiss them in a more honourable manner. (Marg. Ref. l, m.) This reply might well alarm them: for, as no man could claim the privilege of a citizen falsely, without exposing himself to the severest punishment; so a prosecution for such illegal treatment of Roman citizens would have subjected the magistrates to heavy penalties, and incapacitated them from ever again exercising authority; if not to capital punishment. They therefore came, and submissively entreated Paul and Silas to leave the city, lest further commotions should be excited, in which they might not be able to protect them: and, as the apostle by no means intended to require reparation for the injury, he and Silas went to the house of Lydia, and, having visited and encouraged the other new converts, they departed.—The epistle to the Philippians, shows what a flourishing church was at this time planted; and in what a happy manner these troubles terminated. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. "The wisdom that is from above" is peculiarly requisite, that we may know when, and how far, we may bear with men's prejudices, in order to their edification; and when we must resolutely protest against them. (Note, 1 Cor. 9:19—23.) But if a man have it at heart to carry his point, privily? Nay, verily; but [m]let them come themselves and fetch us out.

38 And the sergeants told these words unto the magistrates: [n]and they feared, when they heard that they were Romans.

39 And they [o]came and besought them, [p]and brought them out, [q]and desired them to depart out of the city.

40 And they went out of the prison, [r]and entered into the house of Lydia: and when they had seen the brethren, [s]they comforted them, and departed.

[m] far as possible; and if he be delivered from the prevalence of pride, selfishness, obstinacy, and moroseness; he will be directed by circumstances, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, to act according to the word of God: yet his conduct will often appear incongruous and inconsistent to the superficial observer. (Note, 1 Cor. 2:14—16.)—The greatest precaution should be used, that the ministers of Christ be men of good report: lest prejudices against individuals should be added to the carnal enmity of the human heart against the gospel, to prevent their success; and that such as "are of the contrary part may have no evil thing to say of them." Scriptural regulations, therefore, in this and similar concerns, tend exceedingly to the establishment of believers in the faith, and to the increase of the church in numbers. (Notes, 1 Tim. 3:7. Tit. 2:7,8.)—We have no ground to expect to be directed by immediate revelation in the various actions of our lives: but, while we act according to the best of our judgment, in obedience to the word, and dependence on the Spirit of God; we shall find circumstances, apparently casual, operate as prohibitions and directions, subverting our plans, and substituting others in their stead.—"He that holds the stars in his right hand," directs his ministers to the several places where he means to employ them; and often contrary to their own plans and expectations.—When we are, by any means, satisfied of the Lord's will respecting us, we should prepare for obedience, to whatever hardship, labour, and peril it may expose us: and those who go in simplicity, faithfulness, and affection, to preach the gospel among ignorant or careless sinners, do the most for their help and benefit that man can do: though it seldom happens that persons of this character are forward to invite them. The deplorable condition, however, of our fellow-creatures, in very many parts of the world, and even their insensibility to their own danger and misery, ought to stimulate our exertions to carry or send them effectual help; and to aid, by our labours, contributions, and prayers, every Scriptural attempt for that purpose. Nor should we forget, that it was this generous and tender compassion for the inhabitants of this quarter of the globe, without any desire or request from us, or our ancestors, or even from those to whom they were sent, which induced the apostles and evangelists to "put their lives in their hands," and come over into Europe to help us. And could they now address us, it would probably be in these few but emphatical words, "Go thou and do likewise."

V. 13—24. While the servants of Christ wait upon him in his ordinances; he will find them some opening to speak in his name: nor should the most eminent minister be averse to preach to a very small number of the most obscure persons. —The Lord alone can "open the heart" for the reception and belief of his word; (Note, 1 Cor. 3:4—9.) and true faith is always attended by love shown to the servants of Christ: his genuine disciples desire to approve themselves faithful stewards, to "use hospitality without grudging," and to employ their substance in supporting and promoting the gospel; and they commonly prove a blessing to their households also.—The powers of darkness vary their methods of prejudicing the minds of men against the light of the gospel, or drawing off their attention from it.—Lying miracles, and useless divinations, are far more valued, in this evil world, than the truths and precepts of God are: men readily incur expense for the former; but refuse the latter, even when freely communicated: they are much more desirous of being told their fortune, than their duty, or even "the way of salvation!" and impostures, in endless variety, have been used to deceive mankind, and to set them against true religion.—Satan, the father of lies, can declare the most important truths, when it subserves his purpose of deception and murder: and if he were permitted, he could do more mischief, by ingeniously connecting the doctrines of the gospel with pernicious errors and immoral practices, than by any species of superstition, persecution, and infidelity. Much he actually effects in this way, by means of antinomian, enthusiastical, and scandalous preachers; who, being confounded with the real servants of Christ, bring them also into contempt and abhorrence, with thousands, nay millions of superficial observers. But we must strenuously disclaim such coalitions: and commendations, from bad and suspicious characters, should more excite our grief and indignation, than all their calumnies and reproaches. —The conversion of sinners, "from the power of Satan unto God," often deprives those connected with them, of the gains which they made by their vices: thus the gospel interferes with the worldly interests of those, who will do any base thing for money, and prefer the gain of unrighteousness to the lives or souls of those employed by them: and this concurs with other principles, in exciting their rage and persecution. (Notes, 19:23—31. P. O. 21—31. Note, 1 Tim. 6:6—10, vv. 9,10.) So that those who do more good than others, by drawing sinners off from the service of the devil, may expect to be reviled as men "who exceedingly trouble the city:" and while they teach men to fear God, to repent of sin, to believe in Christ, and to live sober, righteous, and godly lives; they will be accused of teaching customs which are illegal, impracticable, or ruinous to the community! Too often indeed the laws of the state interfere with those of God, and the customs of the world contradict the wisdom and holiness of his service. yet, interested opposers frequently make these things a mere pretence for persecution, while they are actuated by avarice, ambition, or revenge alone. The vilest of malefactors may, therefore, expect more favourable treatment than zealous ministers, who will not let sinners go on unmolested in the ways of destruction.—Pride, cruelty, contempt, and enmity, often concur in uniting the mob and the magistrates against them. And if we, in this happy land, escape abuse, stripes, dungeons, the stocks, and the stake; we should bless God for our mild government, and that equitable constitution by which he secures us: and show our gratitude, by praying earnestly for our rulers, and by turning away our ears from those innovators, whom nothing but licentiousness can satisfy.

V. 25—34. The consolations of God are neither few nor small to his suffering servants: he gives them, in answer to their prayers, songs in the darkest night of tribulation, and in the most painful and dreary situation.—What different persons are true Christians, from what they are supposed to be! They are happier than their most prosperous foes, who do their worst to make them miserable: they need not to be strictly guarded, when God requires them to lodge in a prison; and walls, bolts, fetters, and keepers are as nothing, when he wills them to be at liberty. In the most destitute state they have an omnipotent Friend; all nature stands ready to plead their cause; they are capable of becoming the best of benefactors, in their most abject penury; and they are ready to do good to their most cruel enemies.—How wonderful also are the varied methods of divine grace! and how unlikely the objects of it! The Lord sometimes brings sinners acquainted with himself, by occasion of their own crimes; and frequently through the sufferings of his servants. He gently, and by degrees, leads some into the knowledge and experience of his truth: others he alarms by most tremendous dispensations, and snatches them by a gracious violence from the jaws of destruction. (P. O. Luke 19:1—10.) Some are brought as near to hell, as can be conceived; and then are suddenly rescued, and made heirs of heaven. Under the influence of their mad passions, many have been powerfully instigated by Satan, to plunge themselves into the bottomless pit by their own hands; just at the time when God was about to lead them into the ways of peace and felicity. Thus he illustrates and demonstrates the sovereignty and efficacy of his grace; and gives occasion to praises and thanksgivings, which will be varied almost infinitely to all eternity.—Whatever men have been, or have done to us, we ought not to "render evil for evil;" but, if possible, to prevent them from doing harm to themselves; and we should be as earnest in this, on proper occasions, with respect to our greatest enemy, as if he were our brother and friend.—When sinners begin to inquire, under terror and distress of conscience, with earnestness, and a desire of immediate instruction, "what they must do to be saved;" especially when their conduct shows any disposition to relent, and "to do works meet for repentance;" they should all be answered in the same manner, whatever their previous character has been. "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." None can be saved in any other way: none are excluded from salvation who seek it in this way. Yet it is not enough merely to state this unexplained truth, we should further instruct men, in respect of the object, nature, and effects of this faith, as we have opportunity: and when sinners are converted, they will soon learn to love and honour those whom they before despised and hated; they will alleviate the sufferings, which before they derided and augmented; they will supply the wants of the indigent servants of God, and join themselves to them, by professing their faith in Christ, and venturing reproach and persecution for his sake; and they will desire, that all who belong to them, may be devoted to the Lord, and trained up in his service. When such fruits of faith begin evidently to appear, we need not be surprised, if terrors are speedily succeeded by confidence and joy in God: and thus the events which menaced the most fatal consequences, often terminate in mutual congratulations and thanksgivings; and the richest of blessings on the families to which they belong.

V. 35—40. The servants of Christ should suffer persecution peaceably, and forgive injuries readily: yet there may be cases, in which it will be proper for them to claim the protection of the laws, and to protest against the flagrant injustice of oppressive magistrates; especially when they violate the laws of their country which they are commissioned to execute in vehement zeal against the objects of their contempt and

CHAPTER XVII.

Paul preaches at Thessalonica; and some, both Jews and Greeks, believe, 1—4. The unbelieving Jews raise disturbances, and trouble the rulers, 5—9. Paul and Silas are sent by night to Berea, 10. The Bereans ingeniously, attent to the word, and "search the Scriptures daily; therefore many believe," 11, 12. The Jews of Thessalonica follow Paul and Silas to Berea to stir up persecution, 13; Paul is conducted to Athens, 14, 15. His zeal is excited by the excessive idolatry of that city; and he disputes in the synagogue, and in the forum with the philosophers, 16—18. He is brought before the Areopagus, 19—21. He preaches the living God, the Creator and Lord of all, as hitherto unknown to the Athenians, 22—29. He calls on them to repent; because God will judge the world by Jesus, whom he has raised from the dead, 30, 31. Some mock, others purpose to hear him again, and a very few believe, 32—34.

NOW, when they had passed through Amphipolis and Apollonia, they came to [a]Thessalonica, [b]where was a synagogue of the Jews:

2 And Paul, [c]as his manner was, [d]went in unto them, and three sabbath-days [e]reasoned with them out of the Scriptures;

3 [f]Opening and alleging that [g]Christ must needs have suffered, and risen again from the dead: and that [h]this Jesus, whom [*]I preach unto you, is Christ.

4 And [i]some of them believed, and consorted with Paul and [k]Silas; and of [l]the devout Greeks a great multitude, [m]and of the chief women not a few.

5 But the Jews which believed not, [n]moved with envy, [o]took unto them certain lewd fellows of the baser sort, and gathered a company, [p]and set all the city on an uproar, and assaulted the house of [q]Jason, and sought to bring them out to the people.

6 And when they found them not, [r]they drew Jason and certain brethren unto the rulers of the city, crying, [s]These that have turned the world upside down are come hither also;

7 Whom Jason hath received: [t]and these all do contrary to the decrees of Cesar, saying, That there is another king, one Jesus.

8 And [u]they troubled the people, and the rulers of the city, when they heard these things.

9 And when they had taken security of Jason, and of the other, they let them go.

aversion. This (which is far different from resisting the execution of the law itself, when deemed unreasonable) may conduce to public justice, the peace of the church and of the community, and the credit of their profession. (Notes, 23:1—5. Rom. 13:1—5.) But when proper concessions are made by those who have acted illegally, Christians should never express personal resentment, or insist strictly upon reparation: but manifest a disinterested public spirit in every thing. Thus their enemies will be ashamed, silenced, or conciliated; the Lord will make them "more than conquerors" in every conflict; and, instead of being cast down by their sufferings, they shall even become the comforters of their brethren, who have been exempted from so large a share of tribulation. (Note, 2 Cor. 1:1—7, vv. 3—6.)

NOTES.—CHAP. XVII. V. 1—4. Either no Jews resided at Amphipolis and Apollonia or the apostle had no opportunity of preaching among them: at least no mention is any where made of his labours or success in those cities. He therefore journeyed on to the west, till he arrived at Thessalonica, the city in which the Roman governor of Macedonai resided. (Marg. Ref. a.) And there, according to custom, he went to the synagogue, and reasoned from the Scriptures, to the Jews and the other worshippers there assembled, for three successive sabbath-days; adducing many passages from the prophets, explaining their meaning, and thence evidently showing, that according to the prophets the promised Messiah was to suffer death and to rise again; and proving, from the exact fulfilment of these predictions, that Jesus was indeed the Christ, or the Messiah. (Marg. Ref. d—h.) These reasonings did not convince the Jews in general, for their hearts were set upon a temporal kingdom: yet some of them believed, or were persuaded, and united themselves to Paul and Silas: and a great many of the worshipping Gentiles believed; and among the rest, several of the principal women in the city. (Marg. Ref. i—m.) From the epistles to the Thessalonians it is evident, that the apostle was remarkably successful among the idolatrous Gentiles also; and that he continued here a considerable time; but after the first three sabbaths, it is probable, he left the Jews, and preached chiefly to the Gentiles.—As the historian says they, not we; it is conjectured that Luke stayed behind at Philippi, and did not join the company till some time after.—'Upon inspecting the history, I see nothing in it which negatives the supposition, that St. Paul pursued the same plan at Thessalonica, which he adopted in other places; and that, though he resorted to the synagogue only three sabbath-days; yet he remained in the city, and in the exercise of his ministry among the Gentile citizens much longer; and until the success of his preaching had provoked the Jews to excite the tumult and insurrection, by which he was driven away.... The Alexandrian and Cambridge manuscripts read των σεβομενων και Ἑλληνων πολυ πληθος,' ("of the worshippers, and of the Greeks a great multitude.") '... If we be not allowed to change the present reading, ... may not the passage ... be considered as describing the success of St. Paul's discourses, during the three sabbath-days, in which he preached in the synagogue? and ... that his application to the Gentiles at large, and his success among them, was posterior to this?' Paley.—It appears from the epistles to the Thessalonians, that the church at Thessalonica was chiefly formed of converted idolaters; and that St. Paul and his companions entered very particularly into the several parts of Christian doctrine and duty, in their practical instructions of the new converts, before they left the city: and in writing to the Philippians, the apostle observes, that they had sent twice to supply his wants, when at Thessalonica. (Notes, Phil. 4:14—20. 1 Thes. 1:9,10. 4:1—5.) These things show that he laboured in this city much longer than the three sabbath-days here mentioned.

V. 5—9. The unbelieving Jews were enraged, and filled with envy, or fierce zeal, because the apostle preached to the Gentiles that they might be saved. (Marg. Ref. n. Notes, 13:42—48. 14:2. 1 Thes. 2:13—16.) They therefore raised a mob, from among the lowest and most licentious people in the city, who threw every thing into disorder; and then they violently assaulted the house where the apostle and his company generally lodged, in order to drag them before the people as public disturbers.—Jason, the owner of this house, seems to have been a relation of Paul, and a Jew. (Rom. 16:21.)—Paul and his friends were absent or concealed at this time: the multitude therefore dragged Jason, and some other of the new converts, before the magistrates, or rulers of the city; exclaiming, that the men, of whom they had heard many reports, as having excited great confusion in every place, and who attempted innovations, tending to "turn the world upside down," and subvert the established order in religion and civil government, were at length come thither also; and that Jason had lodged them in his house, and had embraced their doctrine, as many others had done. (Marg. Ref. o—s.) They had all, however, broken the edicts of the Roman emperor, and rebelled against his authority: for they avowed that there was another King, one Jesus, who had been crucified; who, they averred, was risen again, and was exalted to a dominion far superior to that of Cesar, and entirely independent on him. (Marg. Ref. t, u.) This accusation gave great disquietude both to the magistrates, and the assembled multitudes: as they feared the displeasure of the emperor, if they should neglect such a charge; and yet they knew not how to proceed upon it. At present, however, they only required Jason and his friends to give security for their peaceable behaviour, and to make their appearance if further called on.

V. 10—15. The Christians at Thessalonica judged it to be no longer safe for Paul and Silas to continue among Paul and Silas by night unto [y]Berea: who, coming thither, [z]went into the synagogue of the Jews.

11 These were [a]more noble than those in Thessalonica, in that [b]they received the word with all readiness of mind, [c]and searched the Scriptures daily, whether those things were so.

12 Therefore [d]many of them believed; also of [e]honourable women which were Greeks, and of men, not a few.

13 But when [f]the Jews of Thessalonica had knowledge that the word of God was preached of Paul at Berea, they came thither also and [g]stirred up the people.

14 And [h]then immediately the brethren sent away Paul, to go [i]as it were to the sea: but Silas and Timotheus abode there still.

15 And they that conducted Paul brought him unto [l]Athens: and [m]receiving a commandment unto Silas and Timotheus for to come to him with all speed, they departed. [Practical Observations.]

16 ¶ Now, while Paul waited for them at Athens, [n]his spirit was stirred in him, when he saw the city [o]wholly given to idolatry.

17 Therefore [p]disputed he in the synagogue with the Jews, and with [q]the devout persons, and in the market [q]daily with them that met with him.

18 Then certain [r]philosophers of the Epicureans and of the Stoics, [s]encountered him. And some said, What will this [t]babbler say? other some, he seemeth to be a setter forth of strange gods: because he preached unto them [t]Jesus and the resurrection.

them; and therefore they secretly sent them to Berea, an adjacent city; and when they came thither, they, without delay, fear, or resentment, proceeded to make known the joyful tidings, concerning the Messiah, to the Jews assembled in the synagogue. (Marg. Ref. x—z.) These proved to be of a more ingenuous, candid, liberal, and teachable disposition than the Jews of Thessalonica; and more deserving of the honourable distinction of Abraham's seed, in which the nation in general gloried: for they applied their minds, with all readiness and seriousness, to the word which the apostle preached to them; and though they did not implicitly receive his doctrine, or submit to his arguments, they impartially and diligently investigated the subject. They not only heard him preach on the[t] sabbath-days, or at other times; but they "every day" employed themselves in searching the Scriptures, and comparing its predictions with the facts attested to them. (Marg. Ref. a—c. Notes, Matt. 13: 23. Luke 8:4—15, v. 15.) Thus many of them were led to a full conviction of the truth; and with these Jews several religious proselytes, and some of the most affluent and honourable women of the city, embraced Christianity. (Marg. Ref. d, e.) But the envious Jews of Thessalonica, hearing of this success, followed Paul and Silas to Berea, and there excited a storm of popular fury against them. And, as Paul was most obnoxious to them, it was judged necessary for him to recede from the danger: they therefore conducted him towards the sea-coast, that it might be supposed he was about to embark for Asia. But he at length changed his course, and arrived at Athens, the most renowned city of Greece; having left his fellow-labourers behind him, to regulate the affairs of the church at Berea; and, having sent word to them to come as soon as they could to him, he waited for them there. It does not appear, that Silas came to him, while at Athens: and Timothy, when he arrived, was sent from Athens back to Thessalonica, as we learn from the first epistle to the Thessalonians: and both he and Silas again joined the apostle at Corinth. (Marg. Ref. f—m. 18:5. Note, 1 Thes. 3:1—5.)

V. 16, 17. It is probable, that the apostle did not at first intend to enter on his ministry at Athens, till Silas and Timothy joined him: perhaps, he had not determined whether he should attempt to publish the gospel there, or pass over into Asia. While, however, he continued in this renowned city, the centre of polite learning, philosophy, and the fine arts, and, as it were, the university of the Roman empire, and of the world, he took little notice of the sculpture and edifices, the fragments of which to this day are considered as the most perfect models of their kind; or of their paintings and exhibitions, and other curiosities of this sort. Paul is generally allowed to have been a man of fine taste and cultivated genius; but his thoughts were too much occupied about more sublime and interesting subjects, to make observations on these elegant or magnificent trifles: (Note, Luke 21:6.) for his spirit was agitated, grieved, sharpened, and filled with zeal, indignation, and astonishment, to see a city, which was thought to be so peculiarly enlightened, wholly devoted to the most stupid idolatry. (Marg. Ref. n.)—It has been asserted that there were more idols at Athens than in all the rest of Greece: the Athenians always imported the deities and superstitions of every nation, along with their arts and learning; so that a satirist ludicrously observed, 'It was easier to find a god, than a man, in that city.' This fact most completely demonstrates the insufficiency of science and philosophy to guide men in matters of religion. The barbarous Scythians, the wild Indians, nay, the stupid Hottentots, have never deviated further from truth, or sunk into grosser darkness, in respect of God and religion, than the ingenious and philosophical Athenians did!—The apostle, however, was thus excited to begin his labours without delay; and first in the synagogue he proposed his doctrine to the Jews and proselytes; and, reasoning with them from the Scriptures, he earnestly endeavoured to convince them that Jesus was the Messiah: (Note, 1—4, v. 2.) but he does not appear to have had great success among them. This was probably on the sabbath-day.—He also argued and reasoned every day in the market-place, or forum, with such of the philosophers, students, or others, as he could meet with: (Marg. Ref. o—q:) for there these men were used to converse and debate concerning their different opinions: and the forum was as much the place in which they met for this purpose, as the change is the place of meeting for the merchants in London.

V. 18. In the forum, the apostle was encountered by certain philosophers of different sects. The Epicureans were gay and superficial infidels, who amused themselves and others with various curious speculations. They ascribed the original of all things to chance: they professed to allow the existence of the gods; yet they contended, that they did not interfere in the creation or government of the world, but indolently satisfied themselves with their own undisturbed felicity: they deemed the enjoyment of this present world the supreme good, and they denied a future state of rewards and punishments. The Stoics allowed the existence of the gods, but supposed them to be bound by eternal and irresistible fatality; they affected almost to extinguish their own feelings and passions; they were most extravagantly proud and obstinate; they judged a virtuous man, according to their notions of virtue, to be independent of their deities, and in some respects superior to them; and spoke as if he might defy fate itself: they maintained that virtue was its own reward, and expressed themselves very obscurely about a future state of retributions. (Marg. Ref. r, s.)—These two sects of philosophers being alike opposite in their tenets to the doctrines of the gospel, and being full of the pride of superior learning, encountered Paul, and thought of silencing him in the argument: and some of them despised him as a babbler, or a man who had picked up a few scraps of learning in different places, of which he wanted to make a show; and as one who was fond of hearing himself speak, even among those who had studied so much more than he had. But others concluded, that he meant to introduce some new deities to their notice: for, being accustomed to deify virtues, vices, health, diseases, &c. they supposed that he preached to them Jesus as a god, and Anastasis or the Resurrection, as a goddess, whom they ought to worship in preference to any of their present idols. V. 19—21. As a multitude seems to have collected around the apostle and his opponents, the latter conducted him, not as a criminal (according to the opinion of some expositors, which is contrary to the whole narrative,) but as a philosophising speculator, to the Areopagus, or principal senate of Athens: and before that renowned body, and a number of philosophers, and other citizens and strangers, they civilly requested him to show them more accurately, what was the new doctrine which he taught; for in all their reading and and inquiries, they had never met with the sentiments which he had delivered. (Marg. Ref. u—z.) This inquiry was merely the result of vain curiosity: for all the Athenians, and the strangers who came thither to study, from every part of the world, occupied themselves almost entirely in devising, learning, or propagating some new sentiment or speculation, having no leisure for any thing else. (Marg. Ref. a.) The word signifies newer: the new imagination or system, of the preceding year, month, or week, soon became like an almanac out of date: it was the taste of the age and place to discard and antiquate every hypothesis, as soon as it became vulgar; and to substitute some newer scheme in its place: and lively ingenious students, especially in metaphysics, commonly run into this humour. If Paul therefore could start some newer speculation, than the newest fashion of philosophy among them, his doctrine would at least gratify and amuse them.

Areopagus. (19) "Mars' hill." Marg. Αρειον παγον. 22. Ab Αρης, Mars, et παγος, collis.—Αρεοπαγιτης, 34. Some learned men think, that the word Areopagus is not properly translated "Mars' hill," or the hill of Mars, as it does not appear that a temple was built to Mars, in the place where the Areopagus convened. They argue, that the name was derived from the trial of murderers by the court there held. (See on Matt. 5:44.) The nature and functions of this court, or senate, which was highly celebrated in those ages and countries, must be learned from the Greek antiquaries; being far too complicated a subject for this publication.—The contemptuous neglect, and the interruption, which the apostle's admirable address met with from it, constrains the impartial inquirer to question, how far such a court, or council, deserved the encomiums so lavishly bestowed upon it.—Strange things. (20) Ξενιζοντα. 1 Pet. 4:4,12. V. 22—25. The apostle being thus called on to declare his doctrine, and placed in a convenient situation for being heard by the senators, philosophers, and people, entered on his subject with very different views from those of his curious auditors. He observed to them, that he perceived them to be in all things exceedingly addicted "to the fear of demons," or the worship of invisible beings. The word is ambiguous, and might be understood either as a commendation or a censure; and doubtless he chose it for that reason, to convey the implied censure, in the most inoffensive manner. Xenophon uses the word, when commending one as a religious man. The Athenians were indeed very religious in their way; but that was altogether superstitious and idolatrous. In surveying the city, and especially the temples, and the manner and objects of their worship, he had met with an altar inscribed "To the unknown God." (Marg. and Marg. Ref. b—d.) It is attested by many writers that there was such an altar: and some think, that, having imported the deities and worship of most other nations; they had erected this altar to the God of the Jews, who was always spoken of as invisible and incomprehensible, and whose names the Jews themselves scrupled to mention. Various other conjectures have been formed: but perhaps, after multiplying their deities to the utmost, some of them suspected, that there was one God superior to all their idols, of whom they yet had no knowledge; and therefore they prevailed to have an altar dedicated to him also. Either way it suited the apostle's purpose, to make this inscription the motto of his discourse; and he informed his learned audience, that he came to declare to them this "unknown God," of whom they confessed themselves ignorant, even while they professed to worship him. Indeed, he was the great Creator of heaven and earth, which neither existed from eternity, nor were produced by chance or by necessity, as some of their philosophers had imagined; but were formed by the One living, self-existent, eternal, almighty God: and as he was the Proprietor and Governor of heaven and earth, he could not be supposed to inhabit temples, as their idols did; nor could he be served with the workmanship or oblations of men's hands, as if he wanted something to consummate his felicity: seeing he himself was the universal Benefactor, and the Source of being, life, breath, and all things, to all creatures; and they were on that account required to worship him and acknowledge their obligations to him, their dependence on him, and their grateful devoted subjection to him. V. 26—29. This glorious God had formed the whole race of men of one family, in that one man and woman, from whom they were all descended; that they might dwell upon the face of the earth as brethren, without injuring each other: and neither blind chance, nor invincible necessity, but God, the sovereign Lord of all, had, in his infinite wisdom and justice, appointed the different ages of the world for the accomplishment of his predetermined counsels and decrees: and had allotted to every one the period in which he should live, and "the bounds of his habitation." (Marg. Ref. l, m. Note, Deut. 32:9.) All this was intended to lead them to seek after him and his favour, and after the knowledge of his perfections, his works, his truth, and will, which was shown to them in the visible creation: if by any means, in their present state of error and ignorance, they might grope after him, as men in the dark, and find him; without which all other science would be of no real value. (Marg. Ref. n.

30 And [u]the times of this ignorance God winked at; [x]but now commandeth all men every where to repent:

Notes, Rom. 1:18—23. Heb. 11:5,6.) Yet the difficulty of knowing the true God did not arise from distance, or his unconcern about human affairs, as the Epicureans vainly supposed; but from very different causes: for in fact "he was not far from every one" of them; as in him all lived, moved, and existed, and must perish without his upholding power. This even some of their own poets had allowed, being in this matter far wiser than the philosophers: for one of them (called Aratus) had said, "We are also his offspring," and others had expressed nearly the same sentiment. If then men were the offspring of God, the absurdity of representing the Deity himself, by gold, or silver, or stone, however exquisitely fashioned and carved, must be evident; as nothing of this kind could do more than form an imperfect resemblance of man's exterior form, without at all representing even the functions of animal life, or the operations of his mind. V. 30, 31. God had indeed long borne with men's apostacy, ignorance, and idolatry: he had acted, as if he would not look upon their provocation, in giving his glory to abominable idols: and, while he continued his providential kindness, he sent no prophets to the nations in general, to call them off from idolatry to the worship of his name. But "the times of this ignorance" were expiring; and by his servants he now "commanded all men every where to repent" of their idolatry and all other sins, and not to attempt any excuse or vindication of their conduct. (Marg. Ref. u, x.)—This was a most bold demand on the self-wise and self-admiring stoics; and as opposite to their notions of virtue and of fatality, as to the epicurean sentiments of chance and pleasure.—The apostle further added, that though they should at present escape with impunity; yet God had "appointed a day," when he would summon all the inhabitants of the earth to his tribunal, and judge them in perfect righteousness, rendering to every man according to his work. This he would do, by that extraordinary Person, "the Man Christ Jesus," who was constituted the universal Lord and Judge of the whole human race. Of this, God "had given" the fullest "assurance to all men," by raising him from the dead, which was proved by most unexceptionable testimony. (Marg. Ref. y, z.)—Thus far the apostle was permitted to proceed in introducing his subject; for much more he certainly intended to say, had not the levity and petulance of his audience constrained him to desist.—[1] Contrast this address with the speculations of the Greek philosophers; with those of the Epicureans and the Stoics in particular. In this contrast, it appears dignified, rational, sublime. It asserts the Being and Unity of God; that he created the world, and all things in it; his universal providence; the intimate relation of men, all over the world, to each other; (though his hearers, the Greeks, had been accustomed to call the rest of mankind barbarians;) the palpable folly of idolatry, and its criminality, with calls to repentance: and it sets before them a future judgment, and a life beyond the grave; all this in the compass of a few verses, in which not a word seems redundant, yet nothing is defective! Whoever reflects on the endless mazes, in which these wise philosophers of Athens, and indeed all those of the ancient world, were wandering, on all these subjects so awfully interesting; and compares the solid rationality of the sentiments, here so simply proposed, with their vain but ostentatious wisdom, must be very much struck indeed.—Then with regard to evidence. They had nothing to offer, but abstruse and bewildering reasonings, which were perfectly incomprehensible by the mass of mankind, and which brought home no effectual conviction to the mind of any one. All was among them without certainty, and without authority. But the apostle was able to confirm his doctrine, by arguments intelligible to all; the conclusiveness of which human nature feels, and cannot but feel. He would have appealed to miracles, (particularly the resurrection of Christ,) and to various other proofs; but his tired audience refused to hear him out.'—The manner of the apostle likewise, in addressing these idolaters and philosophers, who were strangers to the ancient Scriptures, and his reasoning with them on such principles as they allowed or could not deny, should be compared with his addresses to the Jews, who professed to believe the Scriptures, and with whom he argued on the ground of that profession. Christianity might indeed be established by proofs, wholly independent of the Old Testament: yet it called men to believe nothing, as actually accomplished, but what had been predicted, typified, or promised. Of this the inspired preachers never failed to avail themselves, in addressing the Jews; both as a most conclusive proof that their doctrine was from God, in addition to all miracles and other internal and external evidences: and also, as peculiarly interesting to those who possessed, and professed to reverence, the sacred oracles. But to have brought proofs, from Scripture, to idolatrous or philosophizing Gentiles, would have been highly irrational: and St. Paul's example especially, in this particular, cannot be too carefully studied and copied by all who are called to address infidels, or idolaters, or persons totally ignorant and careless in the concerns of religion.

V. 32—34. It is probable, that the Epicureans led the ridicule, by deriding "the resurrection of the dead," as an impossibility or absurdity: the rest of the company, however, found the apostle's doctrine too solemn, alarming, and practical, for their vain and curious minds; and therefore they declined hearing any more on such subjects, till another time (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, 19—21. 24:24—27.) The apostle was indeed treated at Athens with more exterior civility, than in some other places: but none despised or neglected his doctrine with more supercilious indifference, than these speculating philosophers; and this, as it appears, proved the worst soil in which he ever attempted to sow "the good seed of the kingdom." Yet even here grace triumphed over the prejudices of one senator, and a woman of considerable note, with a few others; who believed the gospel, and further attended on the apostle for instructions: but there is no proof or intimation, that a church was founded at Athens. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. It is most evident from this history that the zealous servants of Christ must be despised and hated, by all kinds of unconverted persons, for his sake. Nothing, however, shall in any wise hurt them; and nothing should dismay them, or deter them from publishing the glad tidings of salvation.—We ought to "reason" with our hearers, and to prove our doctrines with conclusive arguments; and not merely to address their imaginations and affections: but our reasonings should be deduced from the word of God, or grounded on it, or suited to call men's attention to it; otherwise we shall lose ourselves in empty speculations, or go beyond our depth. But when we clearly open and explain the Scriptures, and support our conclusions by testimonies of holy writ; when we thus evidently lay before men those truths which relate to the person, sufferings, resurrection, and kingdom of Jesus Christ; and then apply these subjects to their hearts and consciences, by pathetic addresses, warnings, and persuasions; we use the proper means of bringing them to "the obedience of faith," and may expect to see our labours blessed to many souls.—But how strange is it, that men should grudge and envy others those privileges, of which they will not themselves accept! and that zeal for religious creeds or systems should induce them "to take to themselves wicked men of the baser sort," to set cities in an uproar, to assault and destroy men's houses, and to lay wait for their lives! Such proceedings disgrace and betray every cause which they are brought to support: and the friends of truth and piety must mourn and lament, if any of their professed associates take weapons of this kind from the enemies of God and his people, and use them to their annoyance. Mobs are always incompetent judges of liberty and privileges: and how egregiously absurd is it for them and their leaders, to exclaim against others, as disturbers of the peace and order of the community!—Indeed the gospel is intended, in a certain sense, "to turn the world upside down:" for sin and Satan have inverted the right order of things; and when the kingdom of God is established in the hearts of men, an entire revolution takes place in their judgment, maxims, affections conduct, and conversation (Note, 2 Cor. 5:17.)

34 Howbeit [c]certain men clave unto him, and believed: among the which was Dionysius, [d]the Areopagite, and a woman named Damaris, and others with them.

[c] 4. 13:48. Is. 55:10,11. Matt. 20:16. Rom. 11:5,6. [d] 19. John 7:48—52. 19:38—42. Phil. 4:22.

In this respect we should all desire and endeavour "to turn the world upside down;" and should pray that ministers may be sent to every part of the earth, whom the Lord will employ in effecting this blessed revolution among men.—But the kingdom of Christ is not of this world: and his most faithful servants will be the most peaceable subjects to that authority which Providence places over them; they will be ready to obey the decrees of Cæsar, unless he command them to break the laws of their other and more exalted "King," even "Jesus" "the Prince of the kings of the earth;" and then they will meekly endure persecution for conscience' sake. In general, they will leave it to the children of this world, to contend about civil liberties and immunities; except when called on to perform a constitutional duty as members of the community, or when required to act in a public station. So that neither rulers nor people need be troubled, at the increase of real Christians: though many turbulent spirits, making religion the pretext, will ambitiously join in faction and rebellion, and thus bring a disgrace upon the gospel. Of such we should beware; from such we should withdraw; that we may give all reasonable security for our good behaviour in civil society, while we claim the undoubted right of worshipping God according to our consciences.

V. 10—15. True dignity and nobleness of spirit greatly consist in an enlarged and unprejudiced mind, open to conviction, willing to investigate the truth, to examine the evidence adduced in support of men's opinions, and to treat religious inquirers with candour, seriousness, and diligence. Such an ingenuous and teachable disposition comes from above: (P. O. Jam. 1:9—18, vv. 16—18. 3:13—18.) those who possess it cautiously avoid a blind credulity, an obstinate bigotry, and a heedless conceited incredulity; they receive the word of sober teachers "with all readiness of mind;" and, knowing their need of divine instruction, they "daily search the Scriptures, to see whether things be so, or not:" impartiality, humility, and industry combine in their researches, and the truth requires no more. Men of this character will gradually rectify their mistakes, obtain solutions of their difficulties, find answers to their objections, and be led into a solid understanding and firm belief of the gospel. (Notes, Hos. 6:1—3, v. 3. John 1:47—51. 7:14—17.) And when this "noble" disposition is found in those who are also honourable in society, it forms a distinction peculiarly valuable and useful. But nothing can be more ignoble and base, than bigotry and persecution; and many, who appear devout in their way, have in every age and place been most inveterate against the truth, and most active in stirring up others to oppose it.

V. 16—21. The spiritual mind, however ingenious or cultivated, can take little delight in contemplating the most admired productions of science and genius, while it observes, that the persons concerned are wholly enslaved to sin, or given up to impiety and infidelity.—Not only do unlettered savages "sit in darkness, and the region and shadow of death," but even those cities and persons, that are most renowned for civilization and science, are often enveloped in the deepest ignorance, in the things of God and eternity. Indeed, none are more childish in their superstitions, more impious in their speculations, or more credulous of absurd impostures, than some of the most eminent persons for genius and learning have been and are. Thus "God hath made foolish the wisdom of this world:" he has "taken the wise in their own craftiness;" and has made way for the display of his glory, in saving sinners "by the foolishness of preaching." (Notes, 1 Cor. 1:17—31.) The consideration of the state of the world, both wise and unwise, should deeply affect our hearts; while we avow our belief of the sacred Scriptures, and contend for the doctrines revealed in them. Yet, if in the "meekness of wisdom," we should venture to start such topics "as Jesus and the resurrection," either in the busy resorts of commerce, in the courts of justice, in the schools of the philosophers, or in polite company, even in this Christian land; numbers would frown, deride, or exclaim: while Epicureans, and Stoics, and speculators of jarring tenets, would unite in "encountering" us with their arguments, or showing their contempt of us, as vain babblers, or as innovaters in religion. And should any seem to pay a more respectful and civil attention to our discourse; it would probably be in order to gratify a vain curiosity, and to hear 'the new doctrine,' as they would call it. For though the truths of the gospel are, in some respects, as old as the fall of man; yet they are often "strange things" in the ears even of the learned: and they, whose lives have been almost entirely spent in studying, hearing, or telling "some new thing," are frequently totally unacquainted with "the good old way" to heaven; and talk about it in the most obscure and perplexed manner. Indeed, every thing is new to him, who has never heard it before; as the letters of the alphabet are to children, when first taught to read: thus men's deep ignorance is the real cause, why the gospel is stigmatized by them as "a new doctrine!" But modern speculaters seldom show so much respect to the preachers of the gospel, as the Athenians did to Paul; for they are aware that the doctrine of the cross will afford little gratification to curiosity and vain-glory; and that conclusions may be drawn from it, very inimical to their carnal pursuits and sinful lives

V. 22—29. In addressing mankind about their souls and eternal salvation, or its awful reverse, we should study their peculiar dispositions and opinions; and inquire what truths they admit, and what errors they maintain. Thus we may be able to combat them, from their own principles, and gradually point out the absurdity of their tenets, and the inconsistency of their conduct: and we may often graft the truth on such sentiments as they allow.—Alas! how many are there, to this day, who have their devotions and superstitions, and are exceedingly zealous for them; yet the great Object of all worship is to them "an unknown God!"—They are not acquainted with the mysterious manner of his subsistence, the glory and harmony of his perfections, or the way in which he will be approached and served. If such men allow the truth of the Scriptures, we may reason with them from those sacred oracles: otherwise, we should lead them, from self-evident principles, or such as admit of the most obvious proof, to see their need of a revelation, to attend to the evidences of its divine original, and to the beneficial tendency of the things contained in it. Thus we may declare unto them "that God whom they ignorantly worship;" and gradually lead them from the works of creation to the great Creator, and from his providential care and bounty, to their obligations to love and worship him, and their criminality in ungratefully neglecting him. From a view of his perfections and authority, as the great Proprietor and Lord of all, we may expose the vanity of superstition and idolatry, and of all mere outward forms, oblations, and services, by which men have sought to recommend themselves to God; as if they could benefit him, "who giveth to all life, and breath, and all things." We may also infer, that the end and design of God in our creation, and of all his appointments towards us, and of our special advantages is, to lead us to seek and serve him "in spirit and truth," that we may find him, and true happiness in his favour. Hence we may show how men grope in the dark, and proceed amidst bewildering doubts and uncertainties, in this most important matter, though the Lord is near unto us, and "we live, move, and exist in him;" and thus prove their need of his word and Spirit, to lead them into a spiritual acquaintance with him. From the rational nature of man, who is in this respect "the offspring," and bears the image of God, we may infer the absurdity of many established customs and sentiments, which degrade the infinite God even beneath the level of his creatures. Sometimes we may produce the testimony of poets and prophets of their own, in confirmation of our sentiments: and if a man have acquired classical learning and general knowledge, he may thus make a good use of them; yet it is scarcely advisable for those who are intended for the ministry, to spend any very great proportion of their valuable time, about those indecent fables and corrupt principles and practices, which must engross much attention, from those who aspire to proficiency in this kind of learning.

V. 30—34. Notwithstanding all the renown of Athens, and of ancient Greece, God deemed those "the times" and places "of ignorance:" and though he connived at the dishonour there put upon him, yet he did not excuse the impiety and iniquity of the inhabitants. He commanded them, yea, he commands us, and "all men every where to repent:" nor will any proud pretensions to virtue, or vain reasonings about necessity or contingence, or any philosophical or theological system, excuse men in neglecting this call. All men every where need repentance, and must perish without it: all who repent and believe the gospel will be saved; and this is every man's duty, though no one is disposed to perform it without the grace of God. (Notes, Luke 13:1—5.) But the sins, committed in the time of a man's ignorance, will be far less severely punished, than those which are perpetrated, in defiance and contempt of the light of the gospel.—In calling men to repentance, we should always direct their attention to that "appointed day, when God will judge the world in righteousness;" and to Jesus and his authority, salvation, death, and resurrection: and whatever introduction we use, all our discourses must lead to him, and centre in him.—But even the most consummate wisdom and address, united with the purest zeal and simplicity, in the teacher, will often leave the hearers under the deeper condemnation. Some reject the word with supercilious contempt and mockery; and others from indolence, levity, and procrastination. Of all subjects, that gains the least attention which deserves the most: men profess an intention some time to hear it again; but this time never arrives to numbers. It shall, however, be brought to their remembrance at the great tribunal, to seal their condemnation.—No persons are more likely to fall into these snares of Satan, than self-conceited scholars, and scoffing skeptics and infidels. But "if they scorn, they alone must bear it." The minister must be satisfied with having faithfully delivered his message; nay, even if he be interrupted by the petulance of despisers, before he can conclude his subject. The word of God, however, will never be absolutely useless: some Athenians, and some senators, as well as others, "will cleave to the Lord" and his faithful servants; and these may be useful to others in due time. So that we should go on with our

CHAPTER XVIII.

Paul goes to Corinth, meets with Aquila and Priscilla; works with them as a tent-maker; and preaches, first to the Jews, 1—5; and when they opposed and blasphemed, to the Gentiles with more success, 6—8. Encouraged by a vision, he remains there a long time, 9—11. The Jews bring him before Gallio, the proconsul, who refuses to attend to such questions, 12—17. Paul returns by Ephesus to Jerusalem, goes from thence to Antioch, and revisits the churches which he had planted, 18—23. Apollos preaches at Ephesus: and being more fully instructed by Aquila and Priscilla, he goes to Achaia, where he labours very successfully, 24—28.

AFTER these things Paul [a]departed from Athens, and came to [b]Corinth;

2 And found a certain Jew, named [c]Aquila, born in [d]Pontus, lately come from Italy, with his wife Priscilla, (because that [e]Claudius had commanded all Jews to depart from Rome,) and came unto them.

3 And because he was of the same craft, he abode with them, [f]and wrought: for by their occupation they were tent-makers.

4 And [g]he reasoned in the synagogue every [h]sabbath, and [h]persuaded the Jews and the Greeks.

5 And when [i]Silas and Timotheus were come from Macedonia, Paul [k]was pressed in the spirit, [l]and testified to the Jews that Jesus [m]was Christ.

6 And when [m]they opposed themselves, and blasphemed, [n]he shook his raiment, and said unto them, [o]Your blood be upon your own heads; I am clean: [p]from henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles.

7 ¶ And he departed thence, and entered into [q]a certain man's house, named [q]Justus, one that [r]worshipped God, whose house joined hard to the synagogue.

8 And [s]Crispus, [t]the chief ruler of the synagogue, [u]believed on the Lord with all his house: and many of the Corinthians [x]hearing, believed, and were baptized. [Practical Observations.]

9 ¶ Then [y]spake the Lord to Paul in the night by a vision, [z]Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy peace:

10 For [a]I am with thee, [b]and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee; [c]for I have much people in this city.

11 And [d]he [†]continued there a year and six months, teaching the word of God among them.

NOTES.—CHAP. XVIII. V. 1—6. The apostle seems to have had so little prospect of success at Athens, that he left it as soon as he well could: though it does not appear that he was in any degree persecuted. Accordingly, he went to Corinth, in Achaia, (within the peninsula called Peloponnesus,) a city remarkable for opulence, elegance, luxury, and licentiousness. Here he met with Aquila, a Jew, who was a native of Pontus in Asia, but had resided for some time at Rome, where, it is probable, that he was converted to Christianity, with his wife Priscilla. They had, however, lately been expelled from that city, as Jews, by the edict of the Roman emperor; who was induced to treat all of that nation as seditious and dangerous persons. Some think that the preaching about this time, at Rome, that Jesus was the promised Messiah, and "the King of Israel," gave occasion to this severity; but this is very uncertain. (Marg. Ref. a—e.) —Paul, however, being acquainted with the character of these two excellent persons, went to lodge with them; and, having in his youth learned their trade of making tents, which were much used in those warm climates, he wrought at it for his livelihood.—It was an excellent custom in those days, for such persons as received a liberal education, to be also instructed in some mechanical trade: this served them as an amusement in prosperity, and was a certain resource in case all other prospects failed.—Whatever assistance Paul received from the churches at Antioch, or Philippi, or other cities, he was often reduced to great necessity, by the expenses of his journeys: and we learn from many intimations in his writings, that he frequently wrought with his own hands for his subsistence, lest he should be chargeable to his converts. (Marg. Ref. f. Notes, 20:32—35. 1 Cor. 4:9—13. 1 Thes. 4:9—12. 2 Thes. 3:6—9.)—On the sabbath-days, however, as usual, "he reasoned" with the Jews at Corinth, in the synagogue, concerning the kingdom and salvation of Christ, and endeavoured to "persuade" both them, and the Gentiles who joined in their worship, to believe in Jesus as the Messiah. But when Silas (who perhaps had stayed some time at Berea) and Timothy were come to him, to confirm his testimony, and most solemnly to obtest, that Jesus was indeed the predicted Messiah; he was inwardly excited by the Holy Spirit to still greater vehemence of mind, in bearing testimony to his Lord: and when the Jews opposed his doctrine, and even blasphemed the name of Jesus, "he shook his raiment," as renouncing all fellowship with them: and, to add emphasis to his warnings, he declared, that they were likely to perish in their sins by their own default, as murderers of their own souls; but that he, having faithfully delivered his message, was pure from the guilt of their ruin; and would therefore go and preach the gospel to the Gentiles. (Marg. Ref. g—i. l—p. Notes, 13:49—52. 20:25—27. Ez. 3:17,18. 33:2—9. 1 Tim. 5:21,22.) —Pressed in spirit. (5) 'Either his own, or the Holy Spirit, so powerfully urged and constrained him, that he could not refrain from speaking.' Whithy. It is not to be supposed, that the apostle was excited, or constrained, by a vehemence of natural temper, to act improperly on this occasion: and if the ardour of his own spirit was holy, no doubt it was excited by the Holy Spirit. On the other hand, how can it be supposed, that the Holy Spirit urged and constrained him, except by exciting and invigorating holy affections in his heart? (Marg. Ref. k. Notes, Jer. 20:7—9. Ez. 3:12—15. 2 Cor. 5:13 —15.)—He shook his raiment. (6) 'The command of our Saviour was "to shake off the dust from their feet;" and so Paul and Barnabas do: (13:51.) but here Paul also shakes it off from his raiment, as a testimony unto them, that he had now renounced any further dealings with them: adding that now their blood would be upon their own heads, that is, they only would be guilty of it. V. 7, 8. It is probable, that the apostle continued to lodge and work with Aquila and Priscilla: though he no more preached in the synagogue; but used the house of a Gentile, who had renounced idolatry before his conversion to Christianity, and perhaps had been circumcised. This circumstance might tend to give the Jews, who desired it, an opportunity of still attending his preaching. Indeed several of them had already embraced the gospel; especially the chief ruler of the synagogue, with all his family: and many afterwards were converted, and received into the church by baptism, both of the Jews and Gentiles. (Marg. Ref. Note, 1 Cor. 1:10—16.)

V. 9—11. The apostle at this time seems to have been greatly discouraged in respect of his ministry, by the virulent enmity of the Jews, and the dissolute character of the Gentiles; and especially by a consciousness of his own insufficiency, and manifold infirmities. (Notes, 1 Cor. 2:3—5. 2 Cor. 10:7—11. 12:7—10. Gal. 4:12—16.) The Lord Jesus, therefore, condescended to appear to him in vision, to obviate his fears, to imbolden him in his labours, to assure him of his protecting presence, and to inform him that he had "much people in that city." (Marg. Ref. y—c. Notes, 23:11. 27:20—26.) In this he evidently spake of those who were his by election, the gift of the Father, and the purchase of his atonement, though at that time in an unconverted state: (Notes, John 6:36—40. 10:14—18. 11:49 —53.) and what sort of persons these at Corinth then were the apostle has in another place informed us. (1 Cor. 6:9—11.)—Thus encouraged, he fixed his abode at Corinth for a year and a half, during which time he planted a very numerous and flourishing church. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. d.)—People, &c. (10) 'So they are called, who are still heathens, not because of any absolute decree of their election to eternal life; but because Christ saw that they were disposed to believe, and by faith become his people; as elsewhere (John 10:16.) he calls those his sheep who should hereafter believe in him.' Whithy. Thus, in opposing the doctrine of God's decrees, and predestination, the original depravity and carnal enmity of the human heart, and the 12 ¶ And when Gallio was [o]the deputy of [p]Achaia, [q]the Jews made insurrection with one accord against Paul, and brought him to [r]the judgment-seat, 13 Saying, [s]This fellow persuadeth men to worship God contrary to the law.

14 And [t]when Paul was now about to open his mouth, Gallio said unto the Jews, [u]If it were a matter of wrong or wicked lewdness, O ye Jews, reason would that I should [v]bear with you:

15 But if it be [w]a question of words and names, and of your law, [x]look ye to it; [y]for I will be no [z]judge of such matters.

16 And [a]he drave them from the judgment-seat.

17 Then all the Greeks took [b]Sosthenes, [c]the chief ruler of the synagogue, and beat him before the judgment-seat: [d]and Gallio cared for none of those things.

18 ¶ And Paul after this tarried there yet a good while, and then took his leave of the brethren, and sailed thence into [e]Syria, and with him [f]Priscilla and Aquila, [g]having shorn his head in [h]Cenchrea: for he had a vow.

19 And he came to [i]Ephesus, and left them there: [k]but he himself entered into the synagogue, and reasoned with the Jews.

20 When they desired him to tarry longer time with them, [l]he consented not;

21 But [m]bade them farewell, saying, [n]I must by all means keep this feast that cometh in Jerusalem: but I will return again unto you, [o]if God will. And he sailed from Ephesus.

22 And when he had landed at [p]Cesarea, and [q]gone up, and saluted [r]the church, [s]he went down to Antioch.

23 And after he had spent some time there, he departed, and went over all [t]the country of Galatia and Phrygia, in order, [u]strengthening all the disciples. [Practical Observations.] necessity of regeneration, are virtually denied, or at best, totally lost sight of. "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God."—"God who is rich in mercy for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ; by grace are ye saved." (Notes, 13:42—48, v. 48. John 3:3—8. Eph. 2:4—10. Tit. 3:3—7.)—Were such persons as the idolatrous licentious Corinthians disposed of themselves, independently of divine grace, 'preventing them,' to embrace the humbling, pure gospel of Christ; and to change their jovial and sensual rites, for the spiritual worship of the heart-searching holy God? Does this doctrine accord with the ninth and tenth articles of our church? And would it not have been called Pelagian, before the term Arminian was known?

V. 12—17. Gallio is supposed to have been the brother of Seneca, the renowned pagan moralist; and he bears a fair character in history.—As the Jews were allowed the free exercise of their religion at Corinth, they supposed that he would exert his authority against those who innovated on their ancient customs: they therefore tumultuously seized on Paul, and dragged him to the Roman tribunal; and, with much contempt, accused him of inducing men to worship God in a manner contrary to their law. But when the apostle was about to plead his own cause, and to embrace the opportunity of declaring the gospel before Gallio, that magistrate refused to take any cognizance of such matters. He declared, that if any person had been defrauded or oppressed, or if any mischievous licentiousness had been committed; it would have been reasonable for him to attend to the fact, notwithstanding the irregularity and clamour of their proceedings: but, as their dispute related only to their religious peculiarities, the names of Jesus, and the Messiah, or the obligations of the Mosaic law, on all that worshipped the God of the Jews; they should decide for themselves, for he would not trouble himself about such subjects. With this answer he dismissed them, and ordered them away from the judgment-seat, with apparent sternness. And when the Greeks violently assaulted and beat Sosthenes, even in Gallio's presence, he took no cognizance of this breach of the peace, for he "cared for none of those things."—It is not agreed who Sosthenes was: some think that he was the same person at Crispus, before mentioned; (8) others, that he succeeded him as chief ruler of the synagogue, when Crispus embraced Christianity. Some think that he was the leading person in the prosecution of Paul, and that he was contemptuously and cruelly treated by those Greeks who favoured the apostle: others conjecture that he was a Christian, and that the Jews excited the Greeks to abuse him, when they could not prevail to wreak their malice on Paul. We afterwards read of Sosthenes, among the apostle's chief friends: (1 Cor. 1:1.) if this was the same person, as it is probable from the manner in which Luke mentions him, the latter opinion is favoured by it: for the conversion of a leading persecutor would scarcely have been passed over in silence.—The Alexandrian manuscripts and some ancient versions read Jews, instead of Greeks; and it has been conjectured that παντες (they all) was the original reading, and that some transcribers took the liberty of inserting Greeks, and others Jews, in the copies which they wrote. This indeed would remove the difficulty, and clearly show that Sosthenes was a Christian; but the authority for the alteration, is scarcely sufficient to warrant the conclusion. See Paley's Horæ Paulinæ.—Gallio's conduct in this transaction has been considered in very different lights; some having severely condemned it, and others having highly approved it. Doubtless he acted properly, in refusing as a magistrate, to give any assistance to persecutors, or to interfere with the determination of religious controversies: but there evidently was a contemptuous disregard of all such topics, as wholly unworthy of his notice: he probably deemed both Jews and Christians to be ignorant and deluded fanatics; and concluded that it was of no consequence who was right or wrong, in disputes of this nature. A mixture of philosophical scepticism, and of political contempt of religious concerns, compared with affairs of state, seems to have influenced his conduct. (Notes, 23:25—30. 25:19. 26:24—32.) As he would not use his authority against Paul; so he would not protect Sosthenes, or punish the injury done to him, and the historian evidently blames him, because "he cared for none of these things."—'This profane man thought this a controversy rather of words than of things; and considered the doctrine of God as vain words.' Beza.

Was the deputy. (12) Ανθυπατευοντος.—Here only.—See on 13:7.—'Dr. Lardner justly observes, . . . that this is another instance of the exact propriety with which St. Luke expresses himself. For though the province of Achaia, which comprehended all the rest of Greece, had a more various fortune than that of Cyprus, and frequently changed its form of government; yet, A. D. 44, (which is generally supposed to have been about eight years before this event,) it was restored to the senate, and so became proconsular. Doddridge.—Persuadeth. (13) Αναπειθει. Here only. V. 18—23. Notwithstanding the tumultuous enmity of the Jews, the Lord Jesus continued to protect his servant, while he abode a considerable time longer at Corinth. (Note, Rom. 16:1.2.)—At length, however, he took a pious and affectionate farewell of the new converts, and set sail for Syria; being accompanied by Aquila and Priscilla, who intended to settle for a time at Ephesus. But before he embarked, he cut off his hair at Cenchrea, the port of Corinth, on account of a vow which he had taken, respecting some of his multiplied deliverances. (Marg. Ref. u, y.) Probably, this was of the nature of the Nazarite's vow: but when the distance prevented a person from going to Jerusalem, at the expiration of the term; it seems, that he was customarily dispensed with, in cutting off his hair in another place, and not at the sanctuary. Perhaps some casual defilement made it necessary for the apostle to cut off his hair, and begin again the appointed term: and being at so great a distance, it might be judged allowable to do this at Cenchrea; and to offer the required sacrifices when he came to the temple. It is not indeed recorded, that he did offer them; but this by no means proves that he did not. (Note, Num. 6:)—When the apostl arrived at Ephesus, where he left his friends Aquila and Priscilla; he took the opportunity of setting before the Jews, in that city, the substance and evidences of his doctrine: yet he would not be prevailed upon to stay longer with them; as he purposed, for reasons which are not here specified, to be at Jerusalem at the ensuing passover; but he promised to return to them if the Lord would permit him. (Marg. Ref. a—f. Note, Jam. 4:13—17.)—The voyage and circuit here briefly stated must have taken up a long time: yet they are related in very few words; which shows, that the design of the narrative is not so much to gratify curiosity, as to give an instructive specimen of the manner in which Christianity was at first propagated. The travels, labours, and success of the apostle, also, were far greater than a superficial reader would suppose; for the events of years, and the conversion of thousands, are sometimes recorded in a few verses. The apostle sailed from Ephesus to Cæsarea; from thence he travelled by land to Jerusalem: (Note, 23:23,24.) and having shown his affection and respect to the Christians there, and finished the business which he had in view, he went down thence to Antioch in Syria. After a while, he set out a third time from that city, to preach the gospel in Asia Minor; and so he passed again through the several cities and regions, where churches had before been planted: among the rest, through the churches of Galatia, (Note, 16:6—12.) encouraging and animating the disciples, regulating their affairs, and doubtless making numerous converts. (Marg. Ref. g—l.)

V. 24—28. While Paul was making the extensive circuit above stated, Apollos, a native of Alexandria in Egypt, a person of a ready and graceful elocution, and of great acquaintance with the Scriptures of the Old Testament, arrived at Ephesus. (Marg. Ref. n—q. Note, 1 Cor. 16: 12.) He had acquired some knowledge of the way of salvation, by faith in the Messiah; as far as it could be learned from the ministry of John the Baptist, and his testimony to Jesus, whom he pointed out, as "the Lamb of God," "the Son of God," the "Bridegroom of the church," and the promised Messiah. (Marg. Ref. r—t. Notes, John 1:29—34. 3:27—36. It does not however appear, that he had ever been among the Christians; nor is it known when, and by whom, he received Christian baptism: and there is no proof, that he had at this time any miraculous powers. But, being very zealous and "fervent in spirit," for the honour of God, and the interests of true religion; he went from place to place, diligently teaching the Jews what he knew concerning the necessity of "repentance, and fruits meet for repentance," as a preparation for the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom. On these subjects he boldly preached in the synagogue at Ephesus, in the hearing of Aquila and Priscilla: and they perceiving his ability, zeal, and piety, said nothing to his disadvantage, though they found that he had very imperfect views of those subjects on which he spoke. On the contrary, they formed an acquaintance with him, and showed him more completely the doctrine of the gospel, and the things which had taken place in respect of Jesus Christ: and he, with the most amiable humility, received their instructions, and so obtained more adequate qualifications for his important work. (Marg. Ref. u—y.) At length, he determined to go into Achaia, and to Corinth: and, by their recommendatory letters, he was introduced to the Christians there; and proved exceedingly useful to them, and successful in convincing the Jews, in the most public manner, that Jesus was indeed the promised Messiah. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. While the zealous ministers of Christ carefully shun whatever may entangle them in the affairs of this life; they will submit to any hardship or labour, which may be rendered subservient to their usefulness, or remove obstacles out of their way: and to work at a trade, for daily bread, in order to preach the gospel without charge, differs exceedingly from carrying on lucrative business, in order to grow rich, and live in abundance, in connexion with the office of an evangelical preacher.—The knowledge of any thing, by which an honest living can be earned, is a very valuable acquisition: it never can prove injurious to any man; it cannot be taken from him; and it may, on one occasion or other, be peculiarly useful to him.—Even among affluent persons, the ministers of Christ are more likely to do good, by showing an entire indifference to all those things which wealth can purchase; than by affecting a style of living which emulates that of the very persons, from whose liberality it requires and almost demands support.—The love of Christ is the best bond of friendship; and the communion of the saints sweetens labour, contempt, and even persecution.—Cogent arguments and affectionate persuasions should concur in our endeavours to lead sinners to faith in the Saviour; but when great neglect or contempt is manifested; we should be "pressed in spirit" to testify to the truth with greater vehemence, even though it may excite more virulent opposition: and we must warn those who "contradict and blaspheme," that they will perish, and "their blood will be upon their own head," if they reject that faithful testimony by which we keep ourselves pure from the guilt of their destruction. When some oppose the gospel, we must turn to others; (Note, Heb. 6:4—6.) and our regret that so many persist in their unbelief, should not prevent our gratitude for the conversion of some to the faith of the divine Saviour. (Notes, and P. O. Luke 15:1—10.)

V. 9—23. The most eminent, useful, and courageous ministers, experience seasons of dejection and anxiety, through consciousness of their own unworthiness and defects, the prospect of perils and difficulties in their work, and the determined enmity and opposition of many among whom they labour. But the Lord Jesus knows, and will obviate all their fears: he will encourage them "to speak, and not hold their peace;" and he will teach them to trust in his protection amidst all dangers; while he gathers in his chosen flock from those places in which they are scattered before their conversion. Even the irreligion and infidelity of rulers, though exceedingly criminal in itself, has often been overruled for the protection of the disciples of Christ. Whatever be their motives, such magistrates as take care to prevent, or impartially to punish, those crimes which are injurious to the welfare of the community; and who refuse to use their authority in persecuting one religious sect at the instance of another, or in imposing doctrines, forms, and modes of worship, on men's consciences; certainly best understand and perform the duties of their office. Yet, indifference to all religion, and to the infinitely momentous interests of eternity, is no necessary concomitant of toleration, but rather a disgrace to it; as it shows that rulers of this description are actuated merely by indolence and worldly policy, and not by a regard to the rights of conscience, or by a sense of their duty to God: and their toleration or protection of his worshippers, will often be partial and contemptuous, and attended by improper connivance at those who violate the peace of society: as well as a total and systematical neglect of the due improvement of the talents intrusted to them. We should, however, be thankful for security, thus continued to us, in Providence; and we must not forget to pray for those who seem more to regard the liberties of mankind, than the salvation of their own souls.—We ought simply to promote, in our several places, the cause of Christ; forming such plans as seem to us most proper for that end, and relying on the Lord to enable us to accomplish them, if he see good. But alas, how immensely short do we come, in active zeal, diligence, and patience, to the indefatigable "apostle of the Gentiles!" And with what earnestness and alacrity, did he proceed from city to city, and nation to nation, to strengthen the disciples, and make known the salvation of Christ to perishing sinners!

V. 24—28. When natural talents for argument and elocution unite with great diligence in studying the Scriptures; and when they are attended with fervent zeal, piety, and humility, they qualify a man for doing much good by "teaching diligently" and accurately "the things of the Lord." And even, if persons thus qualified and disposed, are at present in many things mistaken or ignorant; the Lord will provide them

CHAPTER XIX.

Paul, arriving at Ephesus, finds disciples who knew only John's baptism; and, having instructed them, and baptized them in the name of Christ, he confers on them the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, 1—7. He preaches first in the synagogue; and then very successfully in a school for two years, God confirming his word by miracles, 8—12. Certain Jewish exorcists, attempting to cast out a devil, in the name of Jesus, are driven away naked and wounded, 13—17. Many, who had used magical arts, are converted, and burn their books, 18—20. Paul, purposing to go into Macedonia, and then to Jerusalem, and afterwards to Rome, sends friends before him, 21, 22. Demetrius, and the silversmiths at Ephesus, raise a mob against him, to support their gainful traffic and the worship of Diana; and this is attended with great uproar and confusion, 23—34. The town-clerk, with great difficulty and address, appeases it, 35—41.

AND it came to pass, [a]that, while Apollos was at Corinth, [b]Paul, having passed through the upper coasts, [c]came to Ephesus: and finding certain disciples,

2 He said unto them, [d]Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? And they said unto him, [e]We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost.

3 And he said unto them, [f]Unto what then were ye baptized? And they said, [g]unto John's baptism.

4 Then said Paul, [h]John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying unto the people, That they should believe on him which should come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus.

5 When they heard this, [i]they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus.

6 And when Paul had [k]laid his hands upon them, [l]the Holy Ghost came on them; and they spake with tongues, and prophesied.

7 And all the men were about twelve.

8 ¶ And he [m]went into the synagogue, and spake boldly for the space of three months, [n]disputing and persuading the things concerning the kingdom of God.

9 But when [o]divers were hardened, and believed not, [p]but spake evil of that way before the multitude, [q]he departed from them, and separated the disciples, disputing [r]daily in the school of one Tyrannus.

teachers, as well as hearers, and lead them forward in the knowledge of his truth and will.—Experienced Christians, when they hear ministers, who seem earnest and pious, though not fully acquainted with the gospel, should by no means despise them, or teach others to undervalue them: they ought rather to endeavour, privately and meekly, to point out this and the other truth to their attention; and so to lead them on to a greater competency of knowledge, and exactness of judgment. And if faithful counsel and instruction are taken in good part, and duly improved; and popular young men are thus open to conviction, and willing to learn from those, who in some respects may be deemed their inferiors; they will make a rapid progress in knowledge, and maturity for usefulness: and they may soon be recommended as useful helpers to those "who have believed through grace;" as well as able defenders of the gospel, against those who set themselves to oppose it.

NOTES.—CHAP. XIX. V. 1—4. After Apollos was gone to Corinth, Paul, having travelled over the upper or inland parts of Asia Minor, establishing the believers, and promoting the gospel, arrived at Ephesus, a rich and famous city on the coast of the Egean sea; where he had before left Aquila and Priscilla, who had privately been making way for his preaching the gospel to the Jews residing in that city. (Marg. Ref. a—c. Notes, 18:18—28.) There he found some religious persons, who expressed a regard to Jesus, as the Messiah: and he inquired of them whether, having believed, they had received the Holy Spirit, in respect of his miraculous gifts. To this they replied, "We have not so much as heard, whether there be any Holy Ghost;" by which they must at least have meant, that they had never been led to expect his miraculous powers, or informed of any thing respecting the extraordinary communication of them to believers, at that time; or about the gospel being especially "the ministration of the Spirit." (Marg. Ref. d, e. Notes, John 7:37—39. 2 Cor. 3:7—11.) 'As Apollos had left Jerusalem, and gone to Alexandria, before the miraculous effusion of the Holy Ghost on the apostles, at the day of Pentecost: so had they also done, and had been travelling into other parts of the world, where the gospel had not yet been planted.' Whitby. This is not improbable: and perhaps, like Apollos, they endeavoured to communicate to the Jews in different places what they had learned from John the Baptist, concerning Jesus, the Messiah, "the Lamb of God," "the Son of God," and "the Bridegroom" of the church; and, having just before arrived at Ephesus, they had not become acquainted with Aquila and Priscilla. But hearing of Paul, it is probable they introduced themselves to him, as persons who believed in Jesus as the promised Messiah: and, perhaps being regarded as teachers of this doctrine, the apostle might suppose that they had received the Holy Spirit, at the day of Pentecost, or by the laying on of the hands of the apostles; till their answer showed that they had very imperfect views of the Christian doctrine. He therefore, further inquired, "unto what they had been baptized:" and their answer introduced his remarks, concerning the ministry and baptism of John, as the forerunner and witness to the Messiah. (Marg. Ref. f—h. Notes, Matt. 3:11,12. Luke 1:76—79. 3:15—20. John 1:6—9,19—42. 3:27—36.)

V. 5, 6. Several learned critics, of different sentiments concerning baptism, have argued that these are the words of Paul, showing the disciples, that when John baptized those who heard his doctrine, he virtually baptized them in the name of Jesus; and not the words of the historian, relating the baptism of these persons, subsequent to the apostle's instruction of them. Some of those who first contended for this interpretation, did it out of zeal against such as they called Re-baptizers, lest they should adduce this example in support of their practice. Yet, by maintaining the baptism of John, and the baptism of Christ, to be entirely the same, they have furnished their opponents with a far more plausible argument, than that which they wanted to wrest from them. But, however that may be, I cannot think, that any impartial man, who never heard of these controversies, would, either from reading the original, or our version, put this construction on the words. If John could, in any sense, be said to "baptize his disciples in the name of the Lord Jesus;" Jesus himself must have been baptized virtually in his own name. (Note, John 3:22—24.) Even St. Paul's question, "Unto what then were ye baptized?" implies a distinction between different kinds of baptism; and denotes, that, while he understood they had been baptized, he also concluded that they had not received Christian baptism, having never heard of the Holy Spirit, in whose name Christians were baptized. (Note, Matt. 28:19, 20, v. 19.)—'This is visible, even in the words of St. Paul here: John said to those that came to his baptism, ινα πιστευσωσιν, (4) not that they did, but that "they should, believe in him that was coming after him;" now they were not to be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, till they did actually believe in him, which they who had received John's baptism were so far from doing, that they were "musing whether John himself were not the Christ."' Whitby. After Christ's ascension no inquiry was made, that we read of, whether the converts had been baptized by John, or not: and if but one of the three thousand, who were baptized on the day of Pentecost, had been John's disciple, (and probably numbers were such,) the baptism of John, and that of Jesus, must have been distinct ordinances. (Note, 2:41.) The difference between that introductory institution to the Christian dispensation, and the imitatory external seal of that dispensation, has been already considered. (Notes, Matt. 3:5,6.)—Some have indeed said, that 'if John's baptism and Christ's were different, our Lord had no communion with the New Testament church in baptism, as he had with the Old Testament church in circumcision.' But "he was made under the law" to fulfil its righteousness, as our Surety; and must therefore, both on that account, and as our example, obey every command, and attend on every institution of God, then in force: whereas, there was not the same reason for his joining in the ordinances of the gospel, which he appointed merely as our Lord and King. Doubtless he ate the passover with his disciples, yet it does not appear that he partook of the eucharist: (Notes, Matt. 26:26—29. Luke 22:14—18.) it is not probable that he did; neither can it be supposed, that he was "baptized into the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," which is essential to Christian baptism. I apprehend therefore, that these persons, having been further instructed by Paul, were admitted into the church by baptism; previously to the communication of the Holy Spirit to them, by the imposition of the apostle's hands, in his miraculous powers and gifts. (Notes, 8:14—17. 10:44—48.)

V. 7. 'The opinion of Bishop Stillingfleet is very probable, that St. Paul designed these twelve men for a nursery of the churches in Asia, or persons to be sent from Ephesus to preach among them.' Whitby. Thus these persons continued in the church of Ephesus, waiting for opportunities of acting as evangelists; as the pastors and teachers had before done at Antioch in Syria. (Note, 13:1—3.)—The case of these disciples seems to have been, in all respects, the same with that of Apollos, though they were less eminent in the church. (Note, 18:24—28.)

V. 8—12. The apostle proceeded after the same method, and met with the same opposition from the Jews, at Ephesus, which he had done in other places. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Note, 18:18—23.) Many obdurately rejected the gospel, and openly reviled "the way" of seeking acceptance with God, by faith in Jesus: (Marg. Ref. o, p.) so that the apostle deemed it proper to separate the disciples from among them, lest they should perplex or subvert them. And, leaving the opposing Jews, he preached the gospel, and argued in behalf of his doctrine, without intermission, "daily," in a public school, before all, both Jews and Gentiles, who would attend him. It is not known whether Jewish divinity, or heathen learning and philosophy, had before been taught in this place, but it is probable, that Tyrannus was converted to Christ, and his school afforded the apostle a commodious place in which to publish his doctrine; which he did with such success for two years together, that in that time, men of all places and descriptions "in Asia had heard the word of the Lord Jesus." At the same time he was enabled to work most extraordinary miracles, in confirmation of his doctrine. (Marg. Ref. q—y. Notes, 5:12—16. John 14:7—14.) The handkerchiefs and aprons (probably such as both men and women, at their work, wore to save their other clothes) could not convey any virtue from the apostle, but were mere tokens of the Lord's omnipotent operation, as the waving of the rod of Moses had been. No doubt the apostle was enabled to confirm his doctrine by miracles, in other places, even though we have no information about it.—'These cures wrought upon absent persons, some of them a considerable distance from Ephesus, might conduce greatly to the success of the gospel among those whose faces Paul himself had not seen.' Doddridge. It may likewise be supposed, that the apostle sent forth some of his assistants, to preach the gospel in the adjacent cities, while he was labouring at Ephesus; and it is not unlikely that the twelve persons before mentioned were thus employed.—'Asia, throughout the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles of St. Paul, does not mean the whole of Asia Minor, or Anatolia, nor even the whole of the proconsular Asia, but a district in the anterior part of that country, called Lydian Asia, divided from the rest, much as Portugal is from Spain, and of which district Ephesus was the capital.' Paley.—Two years. (10) The apostle preached three months in the synagogue, and two years in the school of Tyrannus. But in his address to the elders of Ephesus, he mentions three years: (20:31.) and most commentators date the beginning of these three years from his first coming to Ephesus. (18:19—21.) Nine months, however, seem far too short a time for his voyage and journey to Jerusalem, and his circuit, by Antioch, and through Galatia and Phrygia, and the upper regions of Asia. The circuit itself could not be made, without travelling perhaps a thousand miles, probably on foot, besides the voyage from Ephesus to Cesarea; and the stay in each place, in order to answer the intended purposes, must have been considerable. Neither does it appear, how he could say, "Remember, that by the space of three years, I ceased not to warn every one of you night and day with tears;" if he had been absent from them nine months of the time. It is therefore most natural to conclude, that after he had preached two years in the school of Tyrannus, he continued at Ephesus some months longer, before he went into Macedonia.

V. 13—20. (Note, Num. 22:5.) It was common in those days for persons to exorcise such as were possessed with evil spirits, especially among the Jews; and, whatever methods they employed, they seem to have, in one way or other, expressed a dependence on God, and at some times at least to have succeeded. (Note, Matt. 12:27,28.) The persons here mentioned made a trade of such exorcisms, and travelled from place to place to carry it on. When they were at Ephesus, the superior efficacy of the name of Jesus in the mouth of Paul, above all their adjurations, determined them to adopt his manner, in hopes of increasing their gain: as if the words had operated in some unaccountable manner, as a charm, in producing the effects to which the miracles wrought, on the application of the handkerchiefs and aprons from the body of Paul to the diseased and possessed, might give some occasion. (Marg. Ref. a—c. Notes, 8:9,24.) Thus, without regard to the authority, salvation, or honour of Jesus, they attempted to cast out evil spirits, by adjuring them in his name to depart: and seven sons of one man, a chief priest, (probably the head of one of the twenty-four orders of the priests,) combined together in such an attempt. But the evil spirit, by the mouth of the demoniac, answered, that he "knew Jesus, and understood Paul," when he charged them in the name of Jesus; but who were they? The words are ambiguous; and might imply a confederacy with Jesus and Paul, in consequence of which the evil spirit would have gone out, had Paul thus spoken to him: and Satan might intend to bring the gospel into suspicion by the insinuation. (Marg. Ref. d. Notes, Matt. 12:22—30.) Yet they may signify that the evil spirit knew the power and authority of Jesus, and the efficacy of the apostle's faith, to engage that power by his word: so that if Paul had commanded he must have yielded. But he knew not them, and would not obey their command. On the contrary, the possessed man, instigated by the evil spirit, assaulted the exorcists with supernatural force and fury, overcame them all, tore off their clothes, and drove them out of the house naked and wounded.—A man must himself be "possessed with a spirit" of incredulity, who can doubt of this having been a real possession, and maintain that this event was merely the effect of insanity. (Marg. Ref. e. Notes, 16:16—18. Matt. 8:28,29.)—This extraordinary transaction was soon known all over Ephesus, both to Jews and Gentiles, and clearly proved, that the effects in the miracles of the apostle were produced by the power of Christ, and through faith in his name; thus obviating any false conclusions which might have been drawn from the extraordinary nature of them; (Note, 3:12—16.) and men became afraid to revile or speak contemptuously of the name of Jesus, or to use it for selfish purposes: so that it was in consequence had in great honour. Many, therefore, who had embraced the gospel before, or who were then led to believe it, came and confessed the sins which they had committed, especially in practising magic and sorcery; and showed the arts which they had employed. Many also of those who had been more eminent for these impious and wicked arts, brought the books which treated on such subjects, and which were highly esteemed at Ephesus; and, being determined no more to use them, or to make gain of them, or to throw temptation in the way of others, but rather desirous of expressing their abhorrence of these practices, they publicly burned them. The sum at which they were valued, upon the lowest computation, amounted to about fifteen hundred pounds: some reckon it to have been almost seven thousand; the one supposing drachms to be meant, the other shekels of four times the value. (See Tables.) This was a mighty triumph of the gospel over men's prejudices, favourite pursuits, and love of money; when they were thus at once induced to commit to the flames books which might have been sold for so large a sum, and 21 ¶ After [n]these things were ended, Paul [o]purposed in the spirit, [p]when he had passed through Macedonia and Achaia, [q]to go to Jerusalem, saying, After I have been there, [r]I must also see Rome.

22 So he sent into [s]Macedonia two of them [t]that ministered unto him, Timotheus and [u]Erastus; but he himself stayed in Asia for a season.

23 And the same time [x]there arose no small stir about [y]that way.

24 For a certain man named Demetrius, a silversmith, which made silver shrines for [z]Diana, [a]brought no small gain unto the craftsmen;

25 Whom he called together with the workmen of like occupation, and said, Sirs, [b]ye know that by this craft we have our wealth:

26 Moreover, ye see and hear, [c]that not alone at Ephesus, but almost throughout all Asia, this Paul hath persuaded and turned away much people, saying, [d]That they be no gods which are [e]made with hands:

27 So [f]that not only this our craft is in danger to be set at nought; but also that the temple of the great goddess Diana should be despised, and her magnificence should be destroyed, [g]whom all Asia and the world worshippeth.

28 And when they heard these sayings [h]they were full of wrath, [i]and cried out, saying, Great is Diana of the Ephesians.

29 And [k]the whole city was filled with confusion: and, having caught [l]Gaius and [m]Aristarchus, men of Macedonia, Paul's companions in travel, they rushed with one accord into [n]the theatre.

30 And when [o]Paul would have entered in unto the people, [p]the disciples suffered him not.

31 And certain of [q]the chief of Asia, which were his friends, sent unto him, desiring him that he would not adventure himself into the theatre.

[Practical Observations.]

32 Some therefore [r]cried one thing, and some another: for the assembly was confused; [s]and the more part knew not wherefore they were come together.

they should do further mischief to mankind. (*Marg. V. 21, 22. After these long-continued labours at Ephesus, the apostle purposed to go into Macedonia; either under the immediate guidance of the Holy Spirit, or in the zeal and fervency of his own spiritual mind: but as he did not exactly accomplish his plan, according to the manner which he intended, some prefer the latter interpretation.—He, however, designed to sail westward into Macedonia; and having visited the churches there and in Achaia, to go south-east as far as Jerusalem; and afterwards to return to the north-west, further than he had ever before been, that he might preach the gospel at Rome also. (Marg. Ref. p—r.) Thus he had laid the plan of his voyages and journeys, backward and forward, of some thousands of miles, as if it had been no more than a progress through a single province!—One part of his design, was to collect money in the different churches which he had planted, and to carry it to Jerusalem for the relief of the poor Christians there. For this purpose he sent before him Timothy and Erastus, who had been the chamberlain of Corinth, (Rom. 16:23.) to prepare the minds of the Thessalonians, Philippians, Bereans, and Corinthians; but he continued some time longer at Ephesus, before he went into Macedonia. (24:17. Notes, Rom. 15:22—29. 1 Cor. 16:1—12. 2 Cor. 8:9.)

V. 23—31. In this interim an alarming and perilous disturbance was excited "about that way" of worshipping the God of Israel. (Marg. Ref. y.) Demetrius, a principal silversmith, carried on a large trade for silver models of the renowned temple of Diana at Ephesus, with a little image in each of them; which were in great request, both as curious and beautiful ornaments, and for idolatrous purposes: and in this manufacture he employed a great number of workmen, highly to their emolument, as well as his own. Having therefore convened them, and all others whose occupations were connected with the support of the popular and prevalent idolatry: he reminded them, that they got their wealth by making these silver shrines, or temples, and similar articles of commerce: and he then showed them that Paul's preaching was likely to disgrace and ruin their trade, by persuading the Ephesians and all the Asiatics, "that they were no gods, which were made with hands:" a most heretical tenet, in the judgment of those who grew rich by manufacturing deities! (Marg. Ref. z—d. Notes, Is. 41:5—7. 44:9—20. Jer. 10:3—16. Hos. 8:5,6.) So that, not only were they likely to be impoverished, and the workmen to be deprived of employment and means of subsistence, the business itself falling into disgrace; but their religion likewise was at stake, (about which, in subserviency to his lucre, Demetrius would be thought very zealous,) and the splendid temple and magnificent apparatus with which the great goddess Diana was worshipped, by persons from all parts of the world, were likely to sink into contempt and neglect, to the great injury of their renowned city.—This address to the interest, idolatry, pride, and resentment of the company, was calculated to inflame their passions. Accordingly, in most furious indignation against Paul and the Christians, and with immense zeal for their lucrative religion, they began to exclaim as with one voice, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." This soon brought a mob together, and threw the whole city into an uproar: and as Paul was not met with, the ringleaders of the riot seized upon two of his companions in his travels; and rushed with them into the theatre, where the public games are supposed to have been then celebrating; probably intending to throw them to the wild beasts, with which slaves and condemned malefactors used to fight, for the cruel diversion of the spectators. (Marg. Ref. f—m.) When the apostle understood this, he was desirous of entering into the theatre to speak to the people; being willing to venture himself, in hopes of preserving his friends: but the disciples, knowing that the enraged mob would not scruple to tear him in pieces, interposed to hinder him. Indeed, some of the Asiarchs, or officers appointed from the different cities of Asia, to superintend the public games, being friendly to him, sent to intreat that he would not thus expose himself, as they could by no means undertake to protect him. (Marg. Ref. o—q.)—No gods, &c. (26) 'This plainly shows that the contrary opinion generally prevailed, namely, that there was a kind of divinity in the images of their supposed deities, . . . though some of them . . . learned to speak of them just as the papists now do; who indeed may seem to have borrowed some of their apologies from the heathens.' Doddridge.—The vulgar, both among pagans and papists, always have supposed, that there is some kind of divinity in the image: but the more learned and philosophical palliate the absurdity, by considering the image as the visible representation of the invisible deity or saint. It might also be easily shown, that the processions, and very many other observances of the papists, are copied from pagan customs; and far more clear illustrations of these pompous ceremonies may be made from Virgil, Horace, Ovid Juvenal, 33 And they drew [t]Alexander out of the multitude, the Jews putting him forward. And Alexander [u]beckoned with the hand, and would have made [x]his defence unto the people.

34 But when [y]they knew that he was a Jew, [z]all with one voice, about the space of two hours, cried out, [a]Great is Diana of the Ephesians.

35 And when the townclerk had appeased the people, he said, Ye men of Ephesus, what man is there that knoweth not how that the city of the Ephesians is [b]a worshipper of the great goddess Diana, [b]and of the image which fell down from [c]Jupiter?

36 Seeing then that these things cannot be spoken against, [d]ye ought to be quiet, and to do nothing rashly.

37 For ye have brought hither these men, [e]which are neither robbers of churches, nor yet blasphemers of your goddess.

38 Wherefore if [f]Demetrius, and the craftsmen which are with him, [g]have a matter against any man, [h]the law is open, and there are deputies; let them implead one another.

39 But if ye inquire any thing concerning other matters, it shall be determined in a [i]lawful assembly.

40 For [k]we are in danger to be called in question for this day's [l]uproar there being no cause whereby we may give an account of this concourse.

41 And [k]when he had thus spoken, [l]he dismissed the assembly.

V. 32—41. As Paul did not appear among the people, and the ringleaders of the tumult could not made the multitude generally acquainted with their intentions; some cried one thing and some another: and, as it is usual on such occasions, the greater number of them knew not the cause, for which the tumult had been excited. At length, one Alexander was singled out from the multitude, who made signs with his hand, that he wanted to speak in his own behalf before them. Many think that this was Alexander the coppersmith, who afterwards became an apostate from Christianity; but this is uncertain. (Marg. Ref. s—u. Note, 2 Tim. 4 14,15.) It is not agreed, whether he was a convert to Christianity, or an unbelieving Jew: some think that he desired to declaim against the gospel, and thus to avert the odium from the Jews; and that the Jews put him forward for this purpose, thus joining with the idolaters, though it tended to undermine their own cause: others conclude, that, being seized on, he meant to plead for Christianity and against idolatry, and that the Jews were desirous of his being heard, from an apprehension that this tumult was excited against them, as well as against the Christians. The multitude, however, would not hear him, because they knew him to be a Jew, and an enemy to their idolatry; but, in contempt of all the worshippers of JEHOVAH, and in order to magnify their favourite idol, they with one consent most vociferously cried out, for two hours together, "Great is the Ephesian Diana." (Marg. Ref. y—a. Note, 1 Kings 18:26—29.) Having spent their rage, and wearied themselves in this senseless manner, they were thus kept from greater outrages: till at length the townclerk, or scribe, some magistrate of great authority, was enabled to appease the tumult; after which he spoke to the people with consummate address and ingenuity. He seemed to allow the truth and importance of their absurd traditions and idolatries; though it may be doubted, whether he really believed a word of them. He observed, that it was universally allowed, that their city thought it her chief honour to support the temple and worship of Diana, and to preserve the image of her, which immemorial tradition declared to have fallen down from Jupiter: and was not therefore "made with hands." As these things were undeniable, they ought to behave more quietly and cautiously. They had indeed apprehended two men, and were about to wreak their vengeance upon them: yet they had neither sacrilegiously robbed the temple of Diana, nor the temples of any other of their deities; nor had they uttered any blasphemies against their goddess. The apostle was not present, yet doubtless he too was meant; but, while his doctrine undermined the foundations of idolatry, we may suppose, that he never went out of his way to rail at any particular idol.—The townclerk, or scribe, proceeded to show, that if any persons were injured in their property, or business; they might bring the matter before the proconsuls in a regular course of law, and thus obtain satisfaction. But, if the complaint related to matters of religion, or other public interests; they ought to be decided in a regular meeting of the citizens, or in the accustomed manner, and not before the populace. So that, in fact, the law had been violated that day, by these riotous proceedings: and the city and magistrates were liable to be called into question by the Romans for it, as they could assign no sufficient cause for the insurrection. By this politic harangue, the multitude were prevailed with to disperse; and Paul and his friends were preserved from the most imminent danger.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. We do not at present expect miraculous powers to be conferred on us by the Holy Ghost: yet all who profess themselves to be the disciples of Christ, should be called upon to examine, whether they have received the "seal of the Holy Spirit," in his sanctifying influences, to the sincerity of their faith. (Notes, Rom. 8:14—17. 2 Cor. 1:21,22. Eph. 1:13,14. 4:30—32.) Alas! many seem not to have "heard, that there is a Holy Ghost!" and many regard all that is spoken concerning his graces and consolations, to be enthusiasm and delusion! But it may properly be inquired of them, "Unto what then were ye baptized?" For they evidently know not the meaning of that external sign, on which they place so great dependence. Where, however, men are conscientious and teachable, they will receive increasing light: repentance and its genuine fruits prepare the heart for the comforts and blessings of faith in Christ, and for the witness and earnest of the Holy Spirit: and we should not "despise the day of small things."—When convincing arguments, and affectionate persuasions, only harden men in unbelief, and excite them to blasphemy; we must "separate ourselves," and such as we can influence, from their contagious company; and we should endeavour to find out more teachable persons, to whom we may communicate the glad tidings of salvation.—The power, which attends the word of the Lord Jesus, will eventually distinguish it from other doctrines: he uses divers instruments and means, in exerting his power; but the work of healing our souls, or pulling down the kingdom of Satan, is wholly his own.

V. 13—20. The enemy of souls does not greatly regard those who use the name of Jesus, without faith or love, for the sake of their temporal interest or reputation. He and his associates know the work of the divine Saviour, and the efficacy of his word in the mouth of his faithful servants

CHAPTER XX.

Paul an' his friends go into Macedonia and Greece, and return to Troas, 1—6; who e, as Paul preaches long, Eutychus falls from a window, and is taken up dead: but he is restored to life; and the apostles and disciples break bread, and converse till day-break, 7—12. Paul and his friends sail to Miletus, 13—16. He sends for the elders of Ephesus, 17. He gives to them his ministry, conduct, and prospects, exhorting, warning, and instructing them with great fervency, and faithful love, and "commending them to God and the word of his grace," 18—35. He prays with them; and takes a most affectionate farewell, leaving them in great sorrow, because they should see his face no more, 36—38.

but they despise hireling preachers, and hypocritical professors of the gospel, whom they will overcome to their destruction. But all the efforts of the devil and his servants, to disgrace or oppose the cause of Christ, eventually redound to its honour, and to the credit of his faithful ministers.—The name of Jesus is magnified, when deceivers are detected and disgraced; when sinners are brought to confess and forsake their evil deeds; when they renounce their curious arts, and iniquitous or impious gains, in obedience to the gospel; and when they make expensive sacrifices to the truth, in the presence of all men.—It would by no means be proper, that all books which have no relation to matters of religion, or are not altogether favourable to it, should be destroyed: but surely such as are indecent and licentious, scornfully infidel, or heretical in essential matters, would be condemned to the flames, if "the word of God grew mightily and prevailed" among us; not indeed by the sentence of the inquisitor, but by the voluntary choice of the possessors. Men would, in that case, neither read such books themselves, nor keep them in their houses, to poison the principles and morals of their children or dependents; nor sell them to contaminate the minds and murder the souls of others. Were all such books destroyed in this kingdom, their price would be found immensely more than "fifty thousand pieces of silver!" Will not then these Ephesian converts rise up in judgment against such professors of the gospel, especially as trade in pernicious books and pamphlets; and who encourage such publications for lucre's sake, as they must know are likely to do great mischief in the world? And is it not a proof, that the word of God declines in its influence and authority, when books pretending to teach, and persons professing to exercise, forbidden and curious and magical arts, are publicly advertised among us? But let no friend of the gospel countenance any pretensions of this kind; whether they be human impositions, or diabolical delusions.

V. 21—31. The enterprising spirit and unwearied diligence of conquerors, navigators, and others, are generally admired: but the same endowments, when directed by love to Christ and to the souls of men, commonly meet with neglect, if not ridicule and contempt! Yet surely our apostle "laboured more abundantly, than all" the admired heroes of the world, or those who explore undiscovered regions; as well as more than any other preacher of the gospel: and happy and honourable are all they, who have been influenced by the same motives, to tread in some good measure in his steps. But when they are most active and successful, they may assure themselves of most opposition from the worshippers of mammon, and the bigots of idolatry and superstition. Indeed the distinct principles of avarice and superstition naturally coalesce: nor would idolatry, delusion, or vice, though congenial to the human heart, meet with so firm and general a support, did they not conduce to the temporal advantage of numbers who grow rich by them. Abuses in ecclesiastical systems, absurdities in creeds, and superstitions in religious worship, will be sure to engage many zealous supporters; while they encourage the elegant arts, with manufactures and commerce, and bring no small gain to the craftsmen and to other parties concerned. The immense encouragement which Popery has always given to painting, sculpture, music, architecture, and other ingenious arts, attaches great multitudes to its splendid forms; and greatly impedes all attempts for reformation. "Sirs, ye know, that by this craft we have our wealth," is often the private argument of men one among another: while the honour of the great Diana, or of the system, the church, or sect, is the ostensible pretence. Nay, the devotees of mammon and superstition not only impose on others, but on themselves; and imagine that they really love their religion, while they only value the affluence, and splendour, and honour derived from it! Their selfishness increases their bigotry; and their interested opposition to the gospel cloaks its malignity under zeal for some forms or observances: their indignation and resentment and envy are expressed in furious zeal for the honour of their idol: and the servants of God are hated and persecuted, because they draw men off from those sins, by which lucrative trades are supported. Such persons would "eat up the sin of the people, and set their hearts upon their iniquities;" whilst they vehemently contend "for the vain conversation delivered by tradition from their fathers." (Notes, 16:16—24. Hos. 4:7—11. 1 Pet. 1:17—21. Rev. 18:11—19. P.O. 9—19.) Ecclesiastical history continually furnishes the student with instances of these combinations: and we can scarcely look around us in the world, but we see the part of Demetrius and the workmen, acted over and over again, even to the filling of cities with tumult and confusion. It is as safe to contend with wild beasts, as with men who are thus enraged by bigotry and disappointed avarice; or who think that all arguments are answered, when they have shown that they grow rich by those measures which the ministers of truth, and the friends of genuine reformation oppose: and whatever side in religious controversies, or whatever name this spirit assumes; it is antichristian, and should be strenuously discountenanced by all the friends of truth and piety.—Zeal for the honour of Christ, and love to the brethren, will induce consistent believers to venture into any danger, where these are concerned: but those who value the lives of useful persons may sometimes properly interpose to moderate their zeal: and friends will often be raised up to them, from those who are strangers to vital religion, but have observed their integrity and consistent behaviour.

V. 32—41. A confused mob can never effect any thing, but mischief and madness. Like a wild beast, it sometimes turns against and destroys those who meant to govern its operations, or to derive advantage from them: and generally the greater part of riotous multitudes know not for what purposes they are come together. (Note, 2 Cor. 1:8—11.) It is well when their fury evaporates in senseless clamour; for it is commonly most cruel and destructive. Yet he, who "ruleth the waves of the sea," can also "still the madness of the people:" and in him we should trust ourselves, and all belonging to us, when perils alarm us.—Worldly policy and sagacity often abound, where piety is utterly wanting: and prudent worldly men, by cajoling the deluded multitudes in their follies and absurdities, prevail far more with them, than the most eminent servants of God possibly could by truth and argument. What senseless fables have they implicitly credited, who would not believe the report of the gospel! And how ridiculous have they often been, in their religious opinions and worship, who have discovered the most consummate good sense upon every other subject! For "the god of this world blinds the minds" of unbelievers. Let us, however, be thankful for prudent magistrates, who can by any means keep the peace, and afford us protection, while we quietly worship God according to our consciences, and endeavour to promote the knowledge of his great salvation.

NOTES.—CHAP. XX. V. 1—6. The apostle probably concluded, that it would be imprudent for him to continue at Ephesus, lest some other insurrection should be excited on his account: he therefore not long after, affectionately took leave of the disciples in that city, and set out to travel into Macedonia. He went through Troas, and had then a favourable opportunity of preaching the gospel: but not meeting Titus, whom he expected from Corinth, he was so desirous of visiting that city, that he proceeded on his journey without further delay. (Marg. Ref. b—d. Note, 2 Cor. 2:12,13.) The first epistle to the Corinthians seems to have been written before he left Ephesus; (Note, 1 Cor. 15:31—34.) and the second, when he was in Macedonia on his progress to Achaia, which probably took up more time than he had expected. (Prefaces to the first and second epistles to the Corinthians.) In the several churches of Philippi, Thessalonica, and Berea, he exhorted, instructed, and encouraged the disciples very copiously, concerning all things relating to their faith and practice, and the management of the common concerns of each church. (Marg. Ref. e.) He was especially employed also in making collections for the poor Jewish converts at Jerusalem. (Note, 19:21,22.) When he had thus passed through Macedonia, he came into Greece, where he spent three months, at Corinth and the adjacent places: and being then about to sail into Syria, he understood that some Jews had formed a conspiracy to meet him by the way, either to rob him of the money which he had 7 ¶ And upon [y]the first day of the week, when [z]the disciples came together [a]to break bread, Paul preached unto them, ready to depart on the morrow; [b]and continued his speech until midnight.

8 And there were many lights [c]in the upper chamber, where they were gathered together.

9 And there sat in a window a certain young man named Eutychus, [d]being fallen into a deep sleep: and as Paul was long preaching, he sunk down with sleep, and fell down from [e]the third loft, [f]and was taken up dead.

10 And Paul went down, [g]and fell on him, and, for embracing him, said, [h]Trouble not yourselves; [i]his life is in him.

11 When he therefore was come up again, and had broken bread, and eaten, and talked a long while, [k]even till break of day, so he departed.

12 And [l]they brought the young man alive, and [m]were not a little comforted. [Practical Observations.]

13 ¶ And we went before to ship, and sailed unto Assos, there intending to take in Paul: for so had he appointed, [n]minding himself to go afoot.

14 And when he met with us at Assos, we took him in, and came to Mitylene.

15 And we sailed thence, and came the next day over against Chios; and the next day we arrived at Samos, and tarried at Trogyllium; and the next day we came to [o]Miletus.

16 For Paul [p]had determined to sail by Ephesus, because he would not spend the time in Asia; for he hasted, if it were possible for him, to be at Jerusalem [q]the day of Pentecost.

17 ¶ And from Miletus he sent to Ephesus, and called [r]the elders of the church.

collected, or to murder him: he therefore returned through Macedonia, and revisited the churches in that region.—The persons here mentioned seem to have been the messengers appointed by the several churches, to accompany him with their contributions to Jerusalem. (Marg. Ref. i—q. Note, 2 Cor. 8:16—24.) Timothy had gone before the apostle into Macedonia; we find him here attending on him, and he was with him when he wrote the second epistle to the Corinthians: (Note, 2 Cor. 1:1—7, v. 1.) yet elsewhere he says, that he desired him to tarry at Ephesus, when he went into Macedonia. (1 Tim. 1:3,4.) It is probable, that the first epistle, to Timothy was written when the apostle was in Macedonia, soon after he left Ephesus: so that we must conclude that Timothy returned thither before Paul came away; and that he stayed there only a short time, before he, on some account, came to Paul in Macedonia. But he might return thither, and take up his stated residence there afterwards, for some time, according to the statement of ecclesiastical writers.—The historian here again speaks in the first person plural, whence we may conclude, that he had now rejoined the company: and he continued with St. Paul, while some of the others went before to Troas, where a Christian Church had before been founded; and thither, after a short time, the apostle followed them. (Marg. Ref. s—x.)

V. 7—12. It is not said, that the disciples were called together, as on a special occasion; but that they came together, as it seems, according to their general practice. Hence it is evident, that Christians were accustomed to assemble for religious worship, "on the first day of the week;" but the change, from the seventh to the first, appears to have been gradually and silently introduced, by example rather than by express precept. (Marg. Ref. y. Note, John 20:19—23.) Their principal time of assembling appears to have been in the evening: either for fear of enemies; or because many servants in heathen families, and other poor persons, could not obtain liberty of meeting them at an earlier hour.—"Breaking of bread," or commemorating the death of Christ in the eucharist, was one chief end of their assembling. (Marg. Ref. z, a.) This ordinance seems to have been constantly administered every Lord's day: and probably no professed Christians absented themselves, after they had been admitted into the church; unless they lay under some censure, or had some real hinderance. It may be gathered from the narrative, that the apostle hastening to Jerusalem, spending seven days at Troas, and departing the next morning, stayed on purpose to spend one Lord's day with them: and, preaching to them on this occasion, as he had seldom spoken to them before, and being about to leave them, not knowing that he should ever see them again, his fervent affection led him to continue his discourse even till midnight. (Marg. Ref. b.) His audience no doubt in general attended to his exhortations with eagerness and delight; but one young man was overcome with sleep, and falling from the third story, was taken up dead. He had, probably, been previously wearied with labour; and perhaps was not duly attentive to the important topics on which the apostle was discoursing.—The enemies of the Christians accused them of holding nocturnal meetings in the dark; but the sacred historian informs us, that there were many lights in the room. And as it was most likely very much crowded, the windows seem to have been open to admit the air.—The fall of Eutychus interrupted the religious exercises of the company, and excited in them much sorrow and anxiety: Paul, however, went down, and embracing the body, exhorted them not to disquiet themselves, for his life was in him. It is probable that Eutychus had been dead: but the apostle was assured of his restoration to life, which perhaps took place at the moment when he spoke, and he afterwards gradually recovered health and strength. (Marg. Ref. c—h.) Accordingly, the company returned to their sacred services: and, after the Lord's supper had been celebrated, and the company had taken some refreshment; the apostle, instead of apologizing for the length of his discourse, resumed the subject, and continued to converse with them till the day dawned, and it was time for him and his friends to set out on their journey. At this time the young man was brought among them alive and well; so that the whole concurred in giving them no ordinary degree of encouragement and consolation. (Marg. Ref. i—m.)—We may easily conceive how many things would be said at Troas, about a night spent altogether in preaching, religious conversation, and devotion: and had Eutychus lost his life, it would have given the enemies of the gospel some plausible ground for exclaiming against unseasonable hours, long sermons, and enthusiastical irregularities.

V. 13—16. Assos, Trogyllium, and Miletus, were cities of Asia, on the sea-coast: Mitylene was a city in the isle of Lesbos, which, with Chios and Samos, was situated near the coast of Asia, in what is now called the Archipelago. Paul chose "to go afoot" from Troas to Assos; probably for the sake of retirement and private devotion, as his public work left him little time to be alone. But he might also intend to call on some friends, or transact some business, unknown to us. When he had joined his company, he determined not to stop at Ephesus, as he knew that he should not easily get away from his beloved people there; and therefore they sailed past Ephesus to Miletus, a city about thirty miles further to the south.—The apostle seems to have had the direction of the vessel, which he could not have had, if merely a passenger: it is therefore probable that it belonged to some of his friends.—His purpose was, to make what haste he could to Jerusalem, that he might spend the feast of Pentecost there: (Marg. Ref. o—q.) perhaps hoping for some opportunity of usefulness among the Jews and proselytes who came to the feast, or of softening their prejudices against him: especially he might deem this the best time for dispensing the contributions which he carried, in such a manner as to promote the friendly communion between the Jewish and Gentile converts.—The historian continues to speak in language which shows that he was one of the company.

V. 17. The apostle could not, with propriety, visit Ephesus: but he desired to give some further instructions and admonitions to "the elders of the church," which he had there planted; and accordingly he sent for them to come to him at Miletus.—The same persons are in this chapter called "elders" or presbyters, and "overseers" or bishops; (28. orders of ministers in the church at that time. Probably, when the apostles founded a church they appointed pastors over it; according to the numbers to be superintended, or the field of usefulness which was opened in the neighbourhood; these were at first called either "elders," or "overseers," that is, presbyters, or bishops, indifferently, and no one had any direct authority over the rest. By degrees the number of converts would increase, other churches would be planted in the neighbourhood, and more pastors chosen. In the mean time the senior ministers, and such as were most eminent for wisdom, ability, piety or usefulness, would acquire a measure of influence and authority: and their juniors, both in their own church, and in others which had been planted from it, would naturally look up to them. Thus they would be expected to take the lead in every business: especially in the ordination of ministers, in directing their labours, and in animadverting on such as turned aside to heretical doctrines, or immoral practices. Hence the name of "Bishop," or Overseer or Inspector, seems gradually to have been appropriated to one principal minister, to whom a measure of authority and distinction was insensibly annexed; and the title and rank of "Presbyters" were continued to the rest. (Note, 11:27—30.) It is evident that episcopacy prevailed, generally and early, in the primitive church; and it seems to have been gradually introduced. There were many elders in the church at Ephesus at this time; yet Christ afterwards addressed his epistle "to the angel of the church of Ephesus;" which seems to mean the superintending pastor, who was an inspector over the elders. (Note, Rev. 2:1.) It appears, to me at least, that neither episcopacy, nor any other species of church-government, can be proved from Scripture, to be exclusively of divine authority. But a moderate episcopacy has many and great advantages to recommend it: and the high claims and excessive authority, which soon began to be advanced and exercised by bishops and lordly prelates, of different titles; and all the abuses of antichristian tyranny, supply the best arguments to those who would entirely exclude that order from the church. In this, however, as well as in other things, very much remains to be remedied and rectified, among every description of Christians, before matters can be reduced to the scriptural standard.—Every impartial man must allow, that if Timothy had been at this time bishop of Ephesus, in that sense for which some contend; the apostle would have given these elders some exhortation, to pay a proper deference to his episcopal authority.—To assert, as some have done, (Dr. Hammond especially,) that these elders of Ephesus were indeed the diocesan bishops of all the Asiatic churches, only exposes the cause which it is meant to support: for, besides the inexcusable liberty taken with the words of Scripture; how could these bishops have been got together, at so short a notice? Unless it be supposed, that they all resided at Ephesus, and left the charge of their dioceses to others, according to the too common custom of later times! The statement would also show, that there were no presbyters; and consequently a parity of ministers, in the primitive church, directly contrary to the sentiments of those who make it. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Phil. 1:1. 1 Tim. 3:1. 5:19,20.)

V. 18—21. 'Paul, a diligent imitator of Christ, hastening to bonds by a continued course, first as it were makes his will; in which he gives some account of his manner of life, defends the doctrine which he had taught, and exhorts the pastors of the church to perseverance.' Beza.—The apostle first called the attention of these elders to the methods which he had pursued, and the conduct which he had manifested, among them, since his first coming into Asia; that is, the district so called, of which Ephesus was the capital. (Note, 19:8—12.) He had at all seasons, however circumstanced, devoted himself to the service and worship of the Lord, in a humble, gentle, unassuming, and self-abasing manner: without aspiring at the honour which came from man, or being ambitious of distinction or authority. (Marg. Ref. t—x. Notes, Matt. 18:1—4. 20:24—28. 1 Thes. 2:1—8. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) His services had been attended with many tears of fervent affection, and with great sorrow of heart; on account of the obstinate unbelief of the Jews, the blind idolatry of the Gentiles, the afflictions, temptations, and misconduct of the Christians, and his own manifold infirmities. He had also encountered many hardships, and been exposed to many perils, from the insidious malice of the Jews and the conspiracies which they laid against him: these were a great trial to him, and might have tempted him to decline the service, or to be unfaithful in his ministry. Yet the elders knew that he had not "shunned," from any motive, to give them, not only instructions, true as far as they went, but all such counsels, warnings, and encouragements, as could conduce to their spiritual advantage; this he had simply consulted without greatly regarding, whether they or others were pleased or displeased with him. What he had taught publicly, he had also discoursed of privately: going "from house to house," among the converts and such as were willing to receive him, to admonish, counsel, and instruct, every one in particular as his case required. (Marg. Ref. y—e.) He had, especially, with the utmost earnestness, insisted upon the absolute necessity of repentance towards God, the great Creator and Governor of the world, whose holy laws all had broken, and whose righteous displeasure they had incurred: before whom they ought therefore to humble themselves with godly sorrow, confessing their sins, and showing their sincerity by works meet for repentance. With this he had connected his unwavering testimony to the necessity of "faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ;" or a belief of those divine testimonies, which relate to his Person, righteousness, atonement, and mediation; and a reliance on him, as the divine Surety and Saviour of sinners, for all the blessings of salvation.—This repentance and faith, when considered in connexion with man's need of them, the source from which they spring, and the invariable effects of them on the heart and life of him, who continually exercises them; may be considered as the substance of Christianity, the religion of a sinner under a dispensation of mercy and grace. V. 22—24. The apostle next informed the elders, that, under the impulse of the Holy Spirit, which constrained him to proceed by the bonds of zeal and love, he was going up to Jerusalem, not knowing what persecutions or trials he might meet with there: save that the Holy Spirit testified in every city, where the gospel was planted by the mouth of some of the prophets there raised up; "that bonds and afflictions awaited him." (Marg. and Marg. Ref. i—l.) This, however, did not in the least deter him from the service which he had undertaken, or so discompose his mind, as to unfit him for his important duties: because "he made no account of these things;" indeed he did not value life, for his own sake; having no desire to live, except the glory of God and the benefit of the church required it. (Notes, Phil. 1:19—26.) For his grand object was, to finish his Christian race, with joyful assurance of meeting the approbation of his Lord, and of receiving "the prize of his high calling;" and, in order to this, to execute faithfully, till death, the important ministry which the Lord Jesus had committed to him; and to testify to sinners of every nation, the glad tidings of the abundant mercy and grace of God, for the complete salvation of their souls. Bound in the Spirit. (22) Perhaps the bonds and imprisonment, which the Holy Spirit, by the prophets, constantly predicted, as awaiting the apostle, were intended by this expression. (23. Note, 19:21,22.) Δεδεμενος πνευματι

V. 25—27. An immediate revelation seems to have been, about this time, made to the apostle, that he should no more revisit Ephesus, or see any of these elders, or those in that neighbourhood to whom he had preached, any more on earth. This made him the more earnest in his exhortations and admonitions; and he therefore testified to them, and called on them to bear witness for him, that he was guiltless of the blood (that is, of the eternal ruin) of those, who might perish among them or their flocks: as he had not declined, either from fear, or desire of their applause, or friendship, to "declare unto them the whole counsel of God," respecting the way of salvation by Christ for all true believers, and the certain destruction of all who neglect so great salvation; and respecting all things pertaining to the doctrine, practice, and discipline of the church. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 18—21. 18:1 —6. Ez. 3:17—19. 33:2—9.) As he had been wholly preserved from ignorance or mistake, about the truth and will of God, in these things; so he had been kept from all unfaithfulness in respect of them.—'Hence we learn, that it is necessary for a pastor to declare to his people, all that is necessary for them to believe and do, in order to salvation, in order that the guilt of their ruin may not lie upon him.' Whitby. It is probable, that the apostle went, after this, into the neighbourhood of Ephesus: (Note, 2 Tim. 4:9—13, v. 12. Philem. 22—25.) and, on this ground, some learned men think, that in saying, "I know that ye all ... shall see my face no more;" he only meant to draw this conclusion from the predictions which were given of the sufferings that awaited him. The elders, however, understood him, as speaking with certainty of what he knew by revelation: nor did he attempt to undeceive them, though he saw them overwhelmed with grief. V. 28. In imitation of the example which he had set them, and in expectation of that great and awful account which they must give of their ministry, the apostle next warned the elders "to take heed to themselves," to their state, spirit, conduct, and doctrine; and to all the flock, over which the "Holy Ghost had made them overseers." (Note, 1 Tim. 4:11 —16.) Their qualifications for the ministry had been derived from the Divine Spirit; he had disposed them to undertake that service; he had directed those who selected and ordained them; and he had confirmed that appointment by his gifts and endowments. (Marg. Ref. b—d. Note, 1 Cor. 12:4—11, v. 11.)—Some think, that the twelve men before spoken of were especially intended, and that the gift of the Holy Spirit, by the laying on of the hands of Paul, was referred to. (Note, 19:7.)—The great end of the pastoral office to which they were appointed, was, that they might "feed the church of God, which he had purchased with his own blood;" that they might continually dispense those pure and wholesome truths, which are the proper nutriment of the soul; and which, when regenerated, it desires, relishes, feeds on, and grows by, in knowledge, faith, hope, and holiness. The conversion of sinners, as part of this chosen flock, is implied in this commission. (Marg. Ref. e—h. Notes, John 21:15 —17. Eph. 4:11—13. 1 Pet. 2:1—3. 5:1—4.)—The most able critics have shown, that the present is the genuine reading of the verse; though a few copies have "the church of the Lord," a phrase not used in the New Testament. The passage is a most decisive testimony to the deity of Christ. The atonement and ransom of our souls is the blood of Jesus, who is as truly God, as man: and thus in his mysterious Person, as God and man, he "purchased the church with his own blood." This gave the infinite value to his sacrifice; and it suggests to his ministers the most powerful motives to faithfulness, diligence, patience, and fortitude in their work. —The personality and deity, and sovereignty likewise, of the Holy Spirit, are clearly shown, in the words, "Over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers."

V. 29—31. To enforce these things still more, the apostle assured his brethren, the pastors of the flock, that he certainly knew, by the Spirit of prophecy, that after he was gone from them, grievous, strong, and cruel wolves would break into the fold, and devour the sheep: these may either mean seducing teachers from other countries, intruding among them and usurping authority, so as to fleece, scatter, or oppress the flock, for the gratification of their own avarice or ambition: or cruel persecutors, by whom many believers were put to death, and many professed Christians were tempted to apostatize. (Marg. Ref. i. Notes, Ez 34:2—6. Matt. 7:15—20.) Besides these, others would spring up from "among themselves," devising and propagating heretical doctrines; corrupting the purity of the faith; disturbing the harmony of the church; drawing off the people from their faithful pastors on various pretences; attaching many to themselves as their disciples; and thus forming scandalous sects and schisms. (Marg. Ref. k—m. Notes, 1 Tim. 1:18—20. 2 Tim. 1:15. 2:14—18. 2 Pet. 2:1—3. Rev. 2:6,7.) As "the enemy sows these tares in the field," while men sleep; (Notes, Is. 56:9—12. Matt. 13:24—30,36—43.) Paul exhorted the elders on this account to watch, and be vigilant to observe and check the first appearance of all these evils: remembering that for three years together he had constantly warned them, one by one, by night as well as by day; bereaving himself of rest and refreshment, that he might seize on every opportunity for these admonitions; and that his earnest affection for their souls, joined with his foresight of these perversions, had caused him to mingle his warnings with many tears. with a deep sense of the arduousness and importance of their work, the apostle concluded by "commending them to God;" earnestly calling on them to rely wholly on his guidance, assistance, protection, and blessing; and calling on God to take their souls, and those of the flock, into his almighty and gracious keeping. He also commended them to the "word of his grace," as the ground of their hope, rule of their conduct, and the source of their consolation; seeing that the Lord was able, according to his word, to build them up in faith and holiness, amidst all the temptations, trials, and delusions, to which they might be exposed; and at length to "give them an inheritance" in heaven, among all those whom he had set apart for himself, and made meet by his sanctifying spirit for that holy felicity. (Marg. Ref. s—y. Note, 26:16—18.) There he expected again to meet them, as "kept by the power of God, through faith unto salvation." (Notes, 1 Pet. 1:3—5. Jude 22—25.)—He could appeal to them, that he had acted disinterestedly among them: though many of the Ephesians were rich, yet "he had not coveted," or in any way sought for any man's wealth, or secular advantages: nay, he had not accepted of that maintenance, to which he was fairly entitled; but had laboured at a manual employment to maintain himself and his fellow-labourers. (Notes, 1 Cor. 9:4—12.) Thus he had showed them, by his example, the tendency of his doctrine; that from him they (even the "presbyters," or "bishops,") might learn, that it was their duty to labour, after the same manner, in order to maintain themselves, and to contribute to the support of their poor brethren, when weak and sick, or otherwise unable to maintain themselves. (Marg. Ref. z—c. Notes, 1 Thes. 5:12—15. 2 Thes. 3:6—9.) They ought also to remember the words which the Lord Jesus had commonly used, as an important aphorism, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." It is more nappy to be able to give, than to be obliged to receive; and therefore better to labour and be frugal, than to indulge sloth and expense: there is more comfort and pleasure in giving than in receiving; there is more of grace, of love, of heaven, and of the divine image, in giving than in receiving. This traditional speech, so suited to the character of him "who, being rich, for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich," would not have been preserved for our use, if it had not thus been committed to writing. (Marg. Ref. d. Notes, 2 Cor. 8:6—9.)—With this example, instruction, and admonition to labour, disinterestedness, and liberality, the apostle closed his address to these elders; and his words could not but make a deep and durable impression on their pious minds.

V. 36—38. (Note, 21:1—6.) The solemn and affectionate address, which has been considered, was concluded with humble and fervent prayer; and the whole company were so affected with the mingled passions of love and sorrow, that they wept much: especially they were exceedingly grieved to hear, that they were no more to behold the face of so faithful and affectionate a friend and instructer. 'This, which is St. Luke's own explication, leaves no room for ambiguity, which might be imagined in the expression used before. (25)' Doddridge. (Marg. Ref.)—It does not appear that there was a church at Miletus; for none are spoken of, but the elders of Ephesus and St. Paul's companions. It is probable, that Timothy went to Ephesus with these elders, and resided there for some time; as we do not find that he accompanied the apostle to Jerusalem, or was with him before he arrived at Rome. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. Tumults and opposition may constrain a Christian or minister to remove from his station, or to alter his purpose: but his employment and pleasure will be the same wherever he goes.—Even believers need "much exhortation," to render them habitually steadfast, zealous, prudent, and persevering in every good work, and to animate faith and prayer to be enabled to do this.—Christians should always delight in commemorating their Lord's death at his table, and his resurrection, by observing his holy day: but the general contempt and profanation of the Christian sabbath by the professed disciples of Jesus, and the withdrawing of so great a majority of the congregation, even where the gospel is preached, when the Lord's supper is about to be administered, evince the low state of vital religion among us, and tend to reduce it still lower.—It shows a carnal state of mind, when people are soon wearied in the worship of God, and are in haste to close it, for the sake of animal recreation, or vain conversation. Doubtless it is inexpedient, on ordinary occasions, to lengthen out religious ordinances much beyond the usual time: yet surely Paul would be displeased, surprised, or grieved, to hear the professors of his doctrine complain of an instructive sermon, because it was an hour long; or of the length of the service, when it scarcely exceeded two hours!—If we cannot wholly excuse Eutychus, for yielding to sleep at midnight, during the apostle's copious exhortations; how inexcusable are they who, in the middle of the day, and during a service of a moderate length, make a practice of sleeping, as if best pleased when most composed to rest! Infirmity or weariness, indeed, requires tenderness: but such an indulged habit of contempt should be treated with decided severity. They who thus offend have cause to tremble, lest some sudden judgment should cut them off in their sin, and leave them to perish without remedy: and such as desire to get the better of this temptation, should join earnest prayers, with all other methods of keeping themselves awake; for when this is neglected, they need not wonder that they are unsuccessful. Should a company of believers among us, on some remarkable occasion, spend a whole night in the exercises of religion, what exclamations, revilings, and derision would it excite! Yet little is said, when the devotees of festive indulgence, fashionable dissipation, or more vulgar revels, employ their nights in the most irregular manner: as if time spent in devotion broke in upon the order of families, or the peace of society, far more than when dedicated to vain amusement, or bacchanalian riot! Or as if more earnestness were allowable in any thing else, than in the service of God!—Nay, many of us, who now count religion our chief joy, can remember a time, when we intrenched upon the hours of rest, for our frolics and pleasures, with far less reluctance than we now should for the purpose of secret or social worship. So hard is it for spirituality to flourish in the heart of a fallen creature, under any culture! and so naturally and spontaneously do carnal affections grow and thrive there!—The Lord, however, will take care of the concerns, and pardon the infirmities, of his people: and he will comfort them under all their tribulations, even when called to separate from those whom they have most loved.

V. 13—21. No Christian can be comfortable or prosperous, without retirement. Popular ministers may preach, converse, or pray in company, to the edifying of others: and yet decline in their own souls, for want of self-examination, humiliation, and secret prayer, suited immediately to their own case: nay, the most able preachers will generally cease to be very useful, if their personal religion is neglected, or hurried over in a formal manner. This the fervent Christian knows; he will therefore redeem time for retirement, at the expense of many inconveniences: and the friends of popular ministers should consider this, and not too much intrude upon the regular and needful hours for retirement of those persons in whose company they most delight.—In prosecuting the work of God, our own inclinations and those of our beloved friends must often be thwarted: we must not "spend our time" with them; when duty calls us another way, or when a prospect is before us of doing more essential good.—As the office of ministers is of the highest importance and difficulty; to instruct, encourage, animate, or admonish those, who now are or hereafter may be employed in it, is a service of very great moment. To do real good to a pastor of the flock, is eventually to profit numbers: and those who have a talent for this service, and a proper call to it, should deem themselves highly honoured, and be satisfied sometimes to omit more public services, for the sake of it. But they who are thus employed, in instructing such as are to instruct others, should themselves be most unexceptionable characters, and be able to appeal to them respecting their own conduct at all seasons.—All those who are employed in the sacred pastoral service, whether favoured with living monitors, in some degree resembling St. Paul, or not, should consider this charge of the apostle as addressed to them, even as really as to the Ephesian elders; and as thus setting before them the proper conduct, spirit, and principles of a true minister of Christ. A proud, ambitious, selfish, and unfeeling heart, is peculiarly opposite to the service of God, in the pastoral office, or to the proper filling up of eminent stations in the church. Unless a man be "clothed with humility" and softened into love and compassion; his very abilities, zeal, and diligence, will be disgusting and odious. Except we are ourselves deeply affected with the subjects on which we treat, how can we expect to affect others? and how can we

CHAPTER XXI.

Paul and his friends leave Miletus, and arrive at Tyre; where, finding disciples, they stay seven days, and part from them with prayer, kneeling down on the sea-shore, 1—6. They proceed to Cesarea, to the house of Philip the evangelist, whose four daughters prophesy, 7—9. Agabus foretells that Paul will be bound at Jerusalem: he is not however dissuaded from going thither, 10—16. Arriving at Jerusalem, he reports to James and the elders, the success of his labours among the Gentiles, 17—19. He is persuaded to purify himself at the temple, with four men who had a vow, 20—26; where he is set upon by some Jews from Asia, and in danger of being slain in a tumult, but is rescued by the chief captain; who binds him with chains, and leads him to the castle, 27—36. He requests, and is permitted, to speak to the people, 37—4.

convince them, that we indeed mean any thing by our exhortations, unless we persevere in our labours amidst temptations and opposition? We must not be "men-pleasers;" nor may we "keep back any thing that is profitable," whatever offence may be taken, or however well some persons would reward us, for conniving at their errors and conformity to the world. (Notes, Gal. 1:6—10. 1 Thes. 2:1—8.)—Indeed the omission of "what is profitable," because not pleasing, is the grand temptation, and sin, of many who teach no false doctrine, but "shun to declare the whole counsel of God;" and omissions in this respect, though less disgraceful, are often equally criminal and pernicious with false doctrine. —What we preach publicly we should also be ready to inculcate privately from house to house, as far as we have access to our hearers, or any prospect of doing them good: and ordinary visits should be thus improved, as well as opportunities of this kind purposely sought for. Thus we shall get acquainted with the state of our people's souls: a private address to an individual will often set a man right, extricate him from some perplexity, remove some difficulty, or stir him up to some duty, about which he had long hesitated: and we also shall thus learn to exercise our public ministry to better effect.—Every part of divine truth ought, at one time or other, to be set before our congregations; and every duty inculcated: but the great essentials, without which there can be no salvation, should be testified most earnestly and frequently: nor can we have a better summary of them, than this of the apostle, even "repentance towards God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ," with their genuine fruits and effects: without these no sinner can escape destruction, and with these none will come short of eternal life. (Note, Heb. 6:9,10.)

V. 22—31. The powerful influences of the Holy Spirit bind the zealous Christian or minister to his duty, in a manner perfectly consistent with the greatest conceivable liberty: even when he expects persecution and affliction, "the love of Christ constraineth him" to proceed. (Note, 2 Cor. 5:13—15.) When he is satisfied respecting his state and duty, he is not moved with the prospect of difficulties or sufferings; he values his life chiefly that he may glorify the Lord with it; nor is it dear to him, for the sake of any of those things which carnal men pursue. His great desire is "to finish his course with joy," and to be welcomed by his Lord with "Well done, good and faithful servant;" and if he has received from the Lord Jesus the office of the ministry, to testify to sinners the glad tidings of the grace of God; he will desire to live no longer than he can execute it honourably and usefully: that when the time shall come, when all "those, among whom he hath gone preaching the kingdom of God, shall see his face no more;" he may be able to "take them to record, that he is pure from the blood of all men, having never shunned to declare to them all the counsel of God;" according to the measure in which he was enabled, by diligently searching the Scriptures, and prayer for divine teaching, to become acquainted with it.—Our Lord Jesus knew perfectly what should befall him at Jerusalem; which exceeded all that any other can possibly suffer or imagine: yet he "steadfastly set his face to go thither." (Note, Luke 9:51—56.) The apostle did not "know what should befall him;" nor do we: but let us be "followers of him as he was of Christ."—Behold in St. Paul the Christian hero! No man was ever celebrated as a hero, who had any reserves in the pursuit of his main object; who could say, I will venture and labour so much, and no more, to attain it. None, who could not say, "Neither count I my life dear to myself," in this grand concern. But only few can say with the apostle, My salvation is sure; this pursuit leads to heaven: "To me to live is Christ, and to die is gain."—When affectionate and faithful pastors are called away from those to whom they have been useful; they will be doubly earnest, that they may be succeeded by those who will "take heed to themselves, and to all their flock;" such as have indeed been made "Overseers by the Holy Ghost," and who will feed them with the wholesome doctrine of divine truth. And what ought we to shrink from, when the benefit of that beloved company, "the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood," requires it at our hands?—It cannot but lie heavy upon the mind of the faithful minister, when about to be removed from his beloved charge, to reflect upon the various perils, to which they will be exposed, from the subtlety and malice of Satan; from cruel persecutors, and crafty seducers; and from such as cause divisions, and "speak perverse things to draw away disciples after them." However, he can only warn them and their teachers, to watch: for if the enemy and his servants are so vigilant and indefatigable, we ought by no means to be heedless and indolent: and if a minister, in this case, can take the people to witness, that he has been "instant in season, out of season," by day and by night, warning and exhorting them with all earnestness and affection; it will give emphasis to his parting admonitions, and confidence to his own heart when he is constrained to leave them.

V. 32—38. When we part from our friends and brethren, we should "commend each other to God, and the word of his grace, as able to build us up," and put us in possession of our holy inheritance: and ministers and their people ought to commend themselves and each other, to God and his word, in the same manner; that they may be kept by his power, according to his promise, and in obedience to his precept, "through faith unto" eternal "salvation." But none obtain that inheritance, except those whom the Lord has sanctified. —It is peculiarly incumbent on all who teach others to aspire after a heavenly treasure, to be themselves indifferent about earthly things, and free from all suspicion of "coveting any man's gold, or silver, or apparel." But alas! few who claim the honour of being 'the successors of the apostles,' in office and authority, are disposed to affect an equality with them in self-denial, and a willingness to labour night and day without emolument, and in circumstances of comparative poverty! It is indeed probable, that their authority, as successors to the apostles, would be far less questioned, if this were their conduct and spirit. The zealous and prudent minister of Christ, however, who is "wise to win souls," will not tenaciously demand even his due maintenance, when it would interfere with his usefulness; but will "suffer all things rather than hinder the gospel of Christ." Should peculiar circumstances require or admit of it; his own hands would minister to his necessities, and those of his family or friends: that he might show the people all his principles reduced to practice; and teach even the poor of the flock thus to labour, that they might be able to assist in supporting the weak; and that every one might learn to inquire, not what gain he shall make, but what good he can do; according to the words of our gracious Lord, who has taught us, that "it is more blessed to give than to receive:" a sentence, that should be written on every heart, especially on that of every minister of the gospel. "This mind was in Christ Jesus;" may it be in us also!—Those who thus exhort and pray for one another, may have many weeping seasons, and painful separations; (Note, 2 Tim. 1:3—5.) but "their sorrow shall be turned into joy," and they will soon meet before the throne to part no more. May the Lord supply his whole church with bishops, presbyters, and pastors of every description, who drink deep into this spirit, and who closely follow the steps of this blessed apostle, and these Ephesian "overseers of that flock which he purchased with his own blood!" Amen, and Amen.

NOTES.—CHAP. XXI. V. 1—6. "And it came to pass, that embarking, having been torn from them, &c." So the first clause may be literally rendered: and the language was evidently intended to convey the idea of that powerful reciprocal affection, which cemented together the hearts of these Christian friends, and rendered their final separation at the call of duty exceedingly painful, and the effect of a very violent effort. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Note, 20:36—38.)—Coos and Rhodes were well-known islands in the Egean sea. Patara was a city of Lycia, upon the continent of Asia. Perhaps the ship, in which Paul and his friends had sailed thus far, was bound to this port. They however met with another, which was about to sail directly into Phenicia, in which they embarked; and, leaving the island of Cyprus on their left hand, they sailed directly to Tyre, where the ship

7 And when we had finished our course from Tyre, we came to Ptolemais, [q]and saluted the brethren, and [r]abode with them one day.

8 And the next day; [s]we that were of Paul's company departed, and came unto [t]Cesarea; and we entered into the house of [u]Philip [x]the evangelist, which was one of the seven, and abode with him.

9 And the same man had four daughters, [y]virgins, [z]which did prophesy.

10 And [a]as we tarried there many days, there came down from Judea a certain prophet, named [b]Agabus.

11 And when he was come unto us, [c]he took Paul's girdle, and bound his own hands and feet, and said, [d]Thus saith the Holy Ghost, [e]So shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle, [f]and shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles.

12 And when we heard these things, both we, and they of that place, [g]besought him not to go up to Jerusalem.

13 Then Paul answered, [h]What mean ye [i]to weep, and to break mine heart? [k]for I am ready not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus.

14 And when he would not be persuaded, we ceased, saying, [l]The will of the Lord be done.

15 And after those days we took up our carriages, [m]and went up to Jerusalem.

16 [n]There went with us also certain [o]of the disciples of Cesarea, and brought with them one Mnason of [p]Cyprus, [q]an old disciple, with whom we should lodge. [Practical Observations.] was to unlade her freight. (Marg. Ref. e—g. Note, 27:4,5.) Here they sought out the disciples of their Lord: and, as the most dangerous part of their voyage was past, and time enough remained for their journey to Jerusalem before the Pentecost, they continued a week at Tyre; in order, probably, to spend one Lord's day with their brethren, as well as to confer together on the interesting subject of their common faith. Some disciples here also cautioned Paul not to go up to Jerusalem: they were shown by the Spirit of prophecy, that he would meet with great sufferings and trials, if he went thither; and they supposed that he might lawfully decline the journey and avoid the danger: but he judged otherwise. 'Does the Spirit of God then oppose himself? By no means. ... But they, understanding, by the revelation of the Spirit, what danger awaited Paul, out of love, and not by any special command of the Spirit, entreated him not to go up to Jerusalem; being ignorant of what the same Spirit had commanded Paul.' Beza. (Marg. Ref. h—k. Notes, 7—14. 20:22—24.) When they therefore departed, the whole company of the disciples, with their families, attended them to the seashore, with the greatest expressions of respect and affection; and there they all kneeled down in the most solemn and humble manner, and united in fervent prayer for each other's protection and felicity. (Marg. Ref. l—p.)—Should a company of believers, in this Christian country, and in the environs of one of our great commercial cities, imitate this example; they would doubtless be derided as a fanatical or hypocritical set of people.—It is most evident, from this circumstance, that kneeling was the general posture for public and social prayer, in the primitive church; otherwise this company would scarcely have used it in so inconvenient a situation.

V. 7—14. The apostle and his friends finished their voyage when they had sailed from Tyre to Ptolemais, a city on the seacoast of Galilee, so called, because rebuilt by Ptolemy, king of Egypt; having before been called Accho. (Judg. 1:31.) Here too they met with disciples, with whom they spent only one day; and on the next they journeyed by land to Cesarea. (Marg. Ref. q, s, t.)—Philip, one of the seven first deacons, whose usefulness as an evangelist is before recorded, now resided in this city; and probably he had laboured there, and in the adjacent parts, during the intervening years. (Notes, 6:2—6. 8:5—13,26—40.) He had the peculiar honour of having four daughters, all endued with the gift of prophecy: (Marg. Ref. y, z. Notes, 2:14—21. Judg. 4:4—9. 2 Kings 22:14. 1 Cor. 11:2—16.) and perhaps they gave intimations to Paul of his approaching trials. As, however, he and his friends stayed at Cesarea several days, Agabus, of whom we read before, (Note, 11:27—30.) came from Judea, properly so called; (for Cesarea lay in that part of the land which belonged to the kings of Israel, not in that belonging to the kings of Judah;) and, with a significant emblem, he certified Paul, by the Holy Spirit, that at Jerusalem he would be seized as a malefactor by the Jews, who would cause him to be bound, hand and foot, and delivered to the Gentiles, as the Lord Jesus had been. (Marg. Ref. c—f.) This prediction induced both the apostle's companions, and the Christians of Cesarea, earnestly to dissuade him from his intended journey out of love to him, and the value which they set on his useful life and labours (Marg. Ref. g.) But he considered himself bound in duty to accomplish the service with which he had been intrusted, of conveying the oblations of the Gentile converts to the church at Jerusalem; and, on this and other accounts, he was steadfastly purposed to proceed, whatever persecutions might await him. The prospect indeed of bonds and imprisonment could not move him; yet the affectionate entreaties of his friends exceedingly distressed his feeling mind: and he earnestly expostulated with them, for thus weeping, and "breaking his heart" with their ill-timed sorrows; which unfitted him for his duty, when they ought to have encouraged him in it: (Marg. Ref. h—k. Notes, 1—6. 20:22—24. Matt. 16:21—23.) for, by the grace of God, he was ready to be bound, or even put to death as a martyr, for the honour of his beloved Saviour, either now at Jerusalem, or whenever he should be called to do it. When therefore they saw him fixed in his purpose, they no more attempted to dissuade him from it; but acquiesced in the will of God as to the event, being satisfied that he could and would overrule it for good. (Marg. Ref. l.)—It was not long after, that the apostle was conveyed back to Cesarea, a prisoner; and, as he had liberty to see his friends, they would again have the opportunity of conversing with him. (Notes, 23:31—35. 24:22, 23.)—Evangelist. (8) 'Evangelist is the name of an office in the apostles' times.' Hammond. 'This word occurs only thrice in the New Testament: Acts 21:8. Secondly, in the epistle to the Ephesians, where evangelists are mentioned after apostles and prophets, as one of the offices which our Lord, after his ascension, had appointed for the conversion of infidels, and the establishment of order in his church; Eph. 4:11. and lastly, 2 Tim. 4:5.... V. 15, 16. When the time allotted for the stay of the apostle and his companions at Cesarea was expired, "they collected and prepared for carriage those things which were to be taken with them," and went up to Jerusalem. It is probable they travelled on foot: and some think that they carried their luggage themselves; others that they laded beasts of burden with it. (Note, 1 Sam. 17:22.) Perhaps it had been conveyed by sea from Ptolemais to Cesarea, though they journeyed by land: but as they were now travelling into the interior part of the country, it became necessary to make some other preparation for the conveyance of it. For they carried with them a considerable sum of money from the Gentile converts, to the poor brethren at Jerusalem. (24:17.) —In this journey, they were attended by some of the disciples of Cesarea, who "brought them to one Mnason," a native of Cyprus, who then lived at Jerusalem, at whose house the apostle and his company might be conveniently lodged, during the feast. He was "an old disciple:" perhaps he had been a disciple of Jesus, during his abode on earth or he had joined the church, soon after the day of Pentecost and had all along maintained (as it must be supposed) a consistent character, and was now matured in wisdom and grace. (Marg. Ref. p.)

17 And when we were come to Jerusalem, the brethren received us gladly.

18 And the day following Paul went in with us [r]unto James; [s]and all the elders were present.

19 And when he had saluted them, [t]he declared particularly what things God had wrought among the Gentiles by his ministry.

20 And when they heard it, [u]they glorified the Lord, and said unto him, Thou seest, brother, [x]how many [y]thousands of Jews there are which believe; [z]and they are all zealous of the law:

21 And they are informed of thee, [a]that thou teachest all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying, That they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs.

22 What is it, therefore? [b]the multitude must needs come together: for they will hear that thou art come.

23 Do therefore this that we say to thee: [c]We have four men which have a vow on them.

24 Them take, [d]and purify thyself with them, and be at charges with them, [e]that they may shave their heads: and all may know that those things, whereof they were informed concerning thee, are nothing; [f]but that thou thyself also walkest orderly, and keepest the law.

25 As touching the Gentiles which believe, [g]we have written and concluded, that they observe no such thing, save only that they keep themselves from things offered to idols, and from blood, and from strangled, and from fornication.

26 Then Paul took the men, and the next day purifying himself with them, [h]entered into the tem-

V. 17—21. The Christians at Jerusalem gladly welcomed the apostle; rejoicing in the success of his ministry, and in the fruits of the faith and love produced by the Gentile converts. The next day he introduced "the messengers of the churches," to the apostle James; who seems to have been the only one of the twelve then residing at Jerusalem, and who peculiarly superintended the concerns of the church in that city: but all the elders were convened on the occasion. After affectionate salutations, Paul proceeded to relate to them particularly, what God had done by his ministry since he last saw them: (Notes, 15:1—6. 16:—20:) at which they rejoiced and glorified God. (Marg. Ref. q—u.) They however entreated him to recollect how many "tens of thousands" of Jewish converts to Christ were now assembled at Jerusalem, who were all zealous for the Mosaic ceremonies, and greatly prejudiced against him for his supposed opposition to them. For they had been informed and had generally imbibed the opinion, that he every where instructed the Jews to apostatize from Moses; inculcating it as a matter of bounden duty, that they should not circumcise their children, or observe any of the customs of the ritual law. (Marg. Ref. x—a.) In this they had been misinformed: for, though the apostle had shown that none were bound to observe the ceremonial law, and that they must by no means place any dependence on such obedience for justification; he had never forbidden the Jewish converts to observe it, as a matter of expediency, when their communion with their Gentile brethren would admit of it. (Note, 16:1—3.)—Elders. (18) 'All the bishops of Judea, saith Dr. Hammond, without one word to prove it.' Whitby. That learned writer's zeal for episcopacy leads him frequently to express himself in a manner, which seems to imply that there were no presbyters in the primitive church; perhaps he was not aware, that this supposition would reduce all ministers, above deacons, to an entire parity of order, as effectually as either the presbyterian or the independent plan could do.—How many thousands. (20) Or, "How many tens of thousands." Gr. This can hardly mean less than forty or fifty thousand: and, though a considerable part of this large number might come from other places to keep the feast; yet it can scarcely be doubted, but that there were so many Christians, statedly residing at Jerusalem, as to form several distinct congregations; yet the whole is spoken of as one church.

V. 22—26. Disadvantageous reports had been circulated concerning Paul. His coming would soon be known; the multitude would certainly come together, to inquire into the reasons and motives of his conduct: and much disturbance might arise from their prejudices, if nothing were done to satisfy them. James, therefore, and the elders, inquired what was proper to be done, to counteract their prejudices. And as they had among them four persons, who were under a Nazarite's vow, the term of which was nearly expiring: they proposed to Paul to join with them as one of the company; that he might purify himself, and bear a part in the expenses of the customary sacrifices, when the time came for them to shave their heads upon the completion of their vow. (Notes, Num. 6:1—21.) As this would be a public transaction, his concurrence in it would soon be known: and thus the whole multitude would at once be convinced, that they had been misinformed; and that the apostle himself "walked orderly," according to the prescriptions of the law. (Marg. Ref. c—f.)—This conclusion seems to have been rather stronger than the real case would admit of. The apostle had before performed a vow of a similar nature; (Note, 18:18—23.) and he doubtless paid some regard to the Mosaic law, as a matter of expediency: but he does not appear to have habitually observed it, as it may be inferred from his own words. (Notes, 1 Cor. 9:19—23. Gal. 2:11—16. 4:12—16.) They probably meant, that he attended to the legal ceremonies, as far as his intimate communion with uncircumcised persons would permit him: but it may be questioned whether this, if it had been fully explained, would have satisfied the persons concerned. James and the elders at the same time avowed, that they intended nothing contrary to their former determination, concerning the Gentile converts: (Note, 15:22—29.) and the apostle, complying with their counsel, took the necessary steps for joining with the Nazarites in their purifications and oblations. (Marg. Ref. g—i.)—It has been questioned whether on this occasion he and his advisers acted in strict consistency with Christian simplicity: and it should be remembered, that, though the apostles were infallibly preserved from mistaking, corrupting, or mutilating the doctrine which they were intrusted to communicate to the church; yet they were not rendered infallible in their personal conduct: in many things, they acknowledged, and it is evident, they all offended, and were to be blamed. (Note, Gal. 2:6—10.) Perhaps it would be found very difficult wholly to defend the apostle from the charge of temporizing, accommodating, or refining too much in this matter. His deference to the judgment of his brethren, his desire of "becoming all things to all men," and his willingness to conciliate the Jewish believers, seem to have carried him rather too far: and he was led to hold out a greater degree of regard to the Mosaic law, than he showed in his general conduct. The concession, however, by no means answered the intended purpose; on the contrary, it was the immediate occasion of his predicted sufferings.—"To be at charges" 'with Nazarites was both a common and a very popular thing among the Jews. . . . Maimonides . . . asserts, that a person who was not himself a Nazarite, might bind himself by a vow to take part with one in his sacrifice. Doddridge.—This, however, not being mentioned in the law, was rather complying with custom and tradition, than showing a regard for the ceremonies of Moses.—'James and the brethren thought it was most regular and convenient, that the Jewish ritual should still be observed by those of the circumcision who believed in Christ. And, considering what tribulation the church at Jerusalem must otherwise have been exposed to by the sanhedrim, who no doubt would have prosecuted them to the utmost as apostates: and also how soon Providence intended to render the practice of it impossible; . . . it was certainly the most orderly and prudent conduct to conform to it; though it were looked upon by those, that understood the matter fully, (which it was not necessary that all should,) as antiquated and ready to vanish away.' Ibid.—The Jewish Christians at Jerusalem and in Judea might comply with the law far more easily and exactly than their brethren could in other countries, who were joined in the same churches with the Gentile converts.—Does not the epistle to the Hebrews, probably written by the apostle when a prisoner at Rome, show, that he thought it of great importance, even to the Christians in Judea, to understand that the Mosaic law had no longer any validity; and that he considered their attachment to it, as exceedingly unfavourable to their proficiency in true religion? (Preface to Hebrews.)

The multitude. (22) Πληθος. 6:2. 15:12. The multitude of Christians are here distinguished from James and the elders, who concert measures to obviate the effect of their prejudices. "The multitude must needs come together"

ple, [i]to signify the accomplishment of the days of purification, until that an offering should be offered for every one of them. [Practical Observations.]

27 ¶ And when the seven days were almost ended, [k]the Jews which were of Asia, when they saw him in the temple, [l]stirred up all the people, [m]and laid hands on him,

28 Crying out, [n]Men of Israel, help: [o]this is the man that teacheth all men every where against the people, and the law, and this place: and further, [p]brought Greeks also into the temple, and hath polluted this holy place.

29 (For they had seen before with him in the city, [q]Trophimus an Ephesian, whom they supposed that Paul had brought into the temple.)

30 And [r]all the city was moved, and the people ran together; [s]and they took Paul, and drew him out of the temple: and forthwith the doors were shut.

31 And [t]as they went about to kill him, tidings came unto the [u]chief captain of the band, [x]that all Jerusalem was in an uproar:

32 Who immediately [y]took soldiers and centurions, [z]and ran down unto them. And when they saw the chief captain and the soldiers, they left [a]beating of Paul.

33 Then the chief captain came near, and took him, and commanded him to [b]be bound with two chains; [c]and demanded who he was, and what he had done.

34 And [d]some cried one thing, some another, among the multitude: and when he could not [e]know the certainty for the tumult, he commanded him to be carried [f]into the castle.

35 And when he came upon the stairs, so it was, that he was borne of the soldiers [g]for the violence of the people.

36 For the multitude of the people followed after, crying, [h]Away with him.

37 ¶ And as Paul was to be led into the castle, he said unto the chief captain, [i]May I speak unto thee? Who said, Canst thou speak Greek?

38 Art not thou that Egyptian, [k]which before these days madest an uproar, and leddest out into the wilderness four thousand men that were murderers?

39 But Paul said, [l]I am a man which am a Jew of Tarsus, a city in [m]Cilicia, [n]a citizen of no mean city: and, I beseech thee, [o]suffer me to speak unto the people.

40 And when he had given him license, Paul stood [p]on the stairs, [q]and beckoned with the hand unto the people. And when there was made [r]a great silence, he spake unto them in the [s]Hebrew tongue, saying,

V. 27—30. As the apostle could not enter on his purification till the third day after his arrival at Jerusalem: (17, 18,26.) and as he made his defence before Felix, (which seems to have been seven or eight days after he was apprehended in the temple,) only twelve days after he came to Jerusalem; (Note, 24:10—21.) the first clause should certainly be rendered, "when the seven days were about to be accomplished:" that is, the seven days which had been fixed on, and mentioned to the priests as the term at the end of which the sacrifices would be offered, and the vow performed. (Note, 22—26.)—At this time some Jews from Asia, (Note, 19:8—12.) who had known Paul when he preached there, saw him in the inner court of the temple, whither he went to the priests, about the sacrifices to be offered: and, being actuated by a furious and bigoted zeal, they excited a tumult, and seized upon him, as a profaner of that sacred place; calling earnestly on all true Israelites to assist them in a cause in which their religion and national honour were at stake. For this was the very man, who had every where taught men to disregard their title to be the peculiar people of God; to violate the law of Moses, as abrogated; and to despise the temple, as about to be destroyed: (Marg. Ref. m—o. Note, 6:9—14.) and to show his contempt and enmity the more, they averred, that he had brought uncircumcised Gentiles into the holy place to profane it. In this they were mistaken: for, having seen Paul walking in the city with Trophimus, a Gentile convert, they took it for granted, that he had also brought him into the temple. (Notes, 19:23 —31,32—41, vv. 32—34.) This outcry, however, soon brought the multitudes from every part of the city; and Paul was dragged as a criminal to be put to death without the sanctuary, lest it should be defiled with his blood: at the same time the doors were shut, that he might not escape to the horns of the altar for refuge, and that no other Gentiles might enter. (Marg. Ref. q—s.)—There was a court appropriated to the Gentiles, in which Trophimus might legally have worshipped: but the insurgents supposed that Paul had taken him into the courts, which none but Jews and circumcised proselytes might enter.

V. 31—36. It has been asserted, that the Jews claimed the liberty of putting to death, without any legal process, such uncircumcised persons as entered the inner courts of the temple: yet even this could not be applicable to Paul. In the fury of their zeal, however, they were about to kill him: but Lysias, the commanding officer of the Roman forces at Jerusalem, being also the tribune, or captain over a thousand men, hearing of the riot, immediately took the centurions and soldiers under his command, or part of them, and hastened to quell it. His presence induced those who were beating Paul, (intending to put him to death by blows with stones or staves,) to suspend their violence: and Lysias, from their rage, concluding that he must be some desperate malefactor, ordered him to be "bound with two chains;" and asked who he was, and of what crime he had been guilty. But, not being able to learn any thing, from the incoherent clamours of the mob, he ordered him to be conveyed to the castle; which stood on an eminence near the temple, being the station of the Roman soldiers who kept guard there. When the soldiers had brought Paul to the stairs, which led to the entrance of the castle, they were obliged to carry him to prevent the people from violently rushing upon him, and killing him: for they all furiously followed after, exclaiming, "Away with him," or "Kill him;" for certainly this was their meaning. V. 37—40. When the apostle had been conveyed into the environs of the castle, out of the reach of the multitude, he desired permission from the chief captain to speak to him: who was surprised to hear his prisoner so readily use the Greek language. He indeed supposed him to have been an Egyptian, who, some time before, had made an insurrection in the city, and leading forth a numerous banditti, had done extensive mischief. For, as that insurgent had escaped, when his followers were destroyed or dispersed, it was natural for Lysias to suppose Paul to be the same person, attempting to excite new disturbances. The apostle however assured him, that he was "a Jew," and a native of Tarsus, and a citizen of no inconsiderable city: he therefore begged of him, that he might be permitted to address the multitude, in order to silence their clamours, and rectify their misapprehensions, by which Lysias also would learn who he was, and what he had done. Accordingly, having obtained permission, he placed himself on the top of the stairs, and made a signal with his hand to the multitude, that he desired to speak to them: and, curiosity concurring with other motives, they observed a profound silence, whilst he addressed them in the Hebrew tongue, at least in that dialect of it which was generally used. —Four thousand, &c. CHAPTER XXII.

The apostle asciares, before the people, the place of his birth, his education, his zeal against the gospel; his conversion, and his commission from Jesus to preach to the Gentiles, 1—21. At the mention of the Gentiles, the people furiously exclaim against him, and the chief captain orders his soldiers to examine him by scourging, 22—24: which he avoids, by pleading the privilege of a Roman citizen, 25—29. He is brought before the council, 30.

[a]MEN, brethren, and fathers, hear ye [b]my defence which I make now unto you.

2 (And when they heard that he spake [c]in the Hebrew tongue to them, they kept the more silence: and he saith,)

No doubt many Chaldee words and phrases came into use among the Jews, who returned from the Babylonish captivity. Yet those parts of the Old Testament, which were written after that event, are in Hebrew, except a few passages in Ezra, which are Chaldee, for special reasons. This creates a difficulty, as to the current opinion taken in its full extent. Nor does the language of the New Testament favour it: and several of the arguments used in support of it, are inconclusive. (Notes, Ezra 4:7—9. 7:11,12. Neh. 8:8. Jer. 10:11. Dan. 2:4.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16. Wherever zealous Christians travel, they will inquire after their brethren in the Lord, and get acquainted with them; because they delight in their company, and desire to do them good, and to derive benefit from them. (Note, Ps. 119:57—63, v. 63.) But, even this sweet and endeared 'communion of the saints' must not induce them to prolong their continuance together, beyond what other duties admit of.—Fervent social prayer abates the poignancy of our sorrow, when constrained to separate from those whom we love: and this is peculiarly seasonable, when sharp afflictions or important services lie before us. Our children, too, should be admitted to such scenes of affection and devotion; that their tender minds may be early impressed with a sense of the excellency and importance of religion: (Note, Gen. 48:1. P. O. 1—8.) Thus we may hope, that when they grow up, they will be evidently partakers of the blessing, and endued with spiritual gifts, for the edification of others also; which should be considered as the greatest favour God can bestow on us, with respect to our offspring.—The path of duty will eventually be that of safety: yet it often leads into many apparent, or temporary dangers and difficulties; the prospect of which may induce those who value the useful lives of eminent persons, to dissuade them from the services allotted to them: but if they are satisfied of their call in Providence; they should not turn aside, out of concern or affection for their friends, any more than from fear of their enemies. It is, however, an extraordinary attainment, for the same man to be so firm and inflexible, in following the dictates of his own conscience, as to be habitually ready to endure bonds, or face death for the Lord's sake; and yet so full of tenderness and sympathy, as to be more affected by the sorrows of his friends, than by the prospect of his own perils and sufferings. (Note, Phil. 2:24—30.)—When we have given the best counsel we can to those who conscientiously desire to know the will of God; and yet find that they are not convinced, or persuaded, by what we have urged; we should desist, and acquiesce in the will of the Lord, who can educe good from those measures and events, which seem to us undesirable or inexpedient.—In our endeavours to do good to our brethren, we should introduce them to the acquaintance of those who have been a comfort or benefit to us: and "old disciples" should be accessible; as well as careful to set their younger brethren an example of humility, spirituality, steadfastness, zeal, prudence, candour, and enlarged love; which may evince, that their dependence on the Lord, and devotedness to him, have increased, according to the years during which they have known him. (Notes, Heb. 5:11—14. Rev. 2:2—5. P. O. 3—7.)

V. 17—26. What a striking proof is it of the weakness and depravity of human nature, that so large a proportion of the disciples of Christ, even in the days of the apostles, were exceedingly disaffected to the most eminent minister, probably, who ever lived! Neither his extraordinary conversion, his blameless and holy character, his peculiar endowments, his extensive labours and usefulness, or his patient sufferings in the cause of Christ; nor yet the oblations which he bestowed so much pains to collect, and bring from the Gentile converts to their Jewish brethren, could conciliate their esteem and affection: because he would not render that respect to the antiquated Mosaic ceremonial, with which they had been used to regard it! Nor could even the authority of James and the pious elders pacify their minds, or prevent their tumultuously assembling together; when they heard that he was come to Jerusalem! How watchful then should we be against prejudices of every kind; and against those misrepresentations of men's principles and conduct, from which prejudices commonly originate! And how patient should we be, if called to have fellowship with the great apostle of us Gentiles in this affliction; and to endure the suspicions and coldness of those whom we most esteem and love! We ought indeed to use all proper methods of rectifying the judgments and conciliating the affections of our brethren, as far as their misapprehension can interfere with our usefulness: yet we should watch against the temptation of conniving at those errors or evils which are the general source of prejudices, and which cannot consistently be countenanced. When accommodation is allowed to infringe upon our "simplicity and godly sincerity," it will seldom produce any good effect. Our brethren will not be satisfied, unless we go to the full length of their sentiments: others will begin to suspect our integrity, and to hesitate concerning us; and it is in vain to attempt conciliating the favour of graceless bigots, and furious zealots of any party, from whom we shall commonly do well to keep at a distance. But much wisdom, integrity, and humility, are requisite to guide us in the middle way, between an uncomplying inflexibility in things of small consequence, and a temporizing spirit in respect of important truth. (P. O. 1 Cor. 9:19—27.) Yet, the Lord will preserve his upright servants from fatal mistakes; though he may see good to leave them to err, in matters of less importance, and in some particular instances.

V. 27—40. Those who idolize notions, or "the form of godliness," while they hate the power of it, will misrepresent or condemn that conduct which God most approves and blesses: thus, if part of the truth be misrepresented, be not rendered sufficiently odious, to exasperate a sect, or a mob, against the objects of their detestation; some false accusation will be devised more fully to effect the purpose: and, as the cause of God is supposed to be at stake, all means are sanctified, by which the help and concurrence of multitudes can be ensured. On these occasions, the professed worshippers of God too often copy the example of the most infuriated idolaters: (P. O. 19:21—31.) and innocency or excellency is no security to any man's life: for, in popular tumults, all discrimination of character, and distinction between truth and error, are confounded. Professed attachments to this or the other party or church among Christians, will readily give energy to the clamour. "Men of Israel, help, &c." The church is in danger! Our religious liberties are in danger! And the groundless outcry may affect the lives or characters, even of the most prudent, benevolent, and pious servants of our God! He, however, is at all times a Refuge for his people: and he sometimes overrules the fury of their enemies to raise them up friends among such as are strangers to him, who become favourable to them, because they find that they are not those vile characters which they have been represented, or suspected to be. And, if he gives us an opportunity of pleading our own cause before those who are prejudiced against us: we should always prepare to speak decidedly and boldly in behalf of the truth, and earnestly to recommend the gospel of Christ to their most serious attention.

NOTES.—CHAP. XXII. V. 1—5. The apostle addressed the enraged multitude, in the customary style of respect and good-will, as "men and brethren;" and, seeing many principal persons present, he also added "fathers," to denote, that he was ready to render them all due honour and obedience, consistent with the will of God, notwithstanding their indignation against him. (Marg. Ref. a. 7:2. Note.

6 And it came to pass, [s]that, as I made my journey, and was come nigh unto [r]Damascus, [t]about noon, suddenly there shone from heaven a great light round about me.

7 And I fell unto the ground, and heard a voice saying unto me, [t]Saul, Saul, [u]why persecutest thou me?

8 And I answered, Who art thou, Lord? And he said unto me, [x]I am Jesus of Nazareth, [y]whom thou persecutest.

9 And they that were with me [z]saw indeed the light, and were afraid; [a]but they heard not the voice of him that spake to me.

10 And I said, [b]What shall I do, Lord? And the Lord said unto me, Arise, and go into Damascus; [c]and there it shall be told thee of all things which are appointed for thee to do.

11 And [d]when I could not see for the glory of that light, [e]being led by the hand of them that were with me, I came into Damascus.

12 And [f]one Ananias, [g]a devout man according to the law, [h]having a good report of all the Jews which dwelt there, 13 Came unto me, and stood, and said unto me, [i]Brother Saul, receive thy sight. And the same hour I looked up upon him.

14 And he said, [k]The God of our fathers [l]hath chosen thee, that thou shouldest know his will, [m]and see [n]that Just One, and shouldest [o]hear the voice of his mouth.

15 For [p]thou shalt be his witness unto all men [q]of what thou hast seen and heard.

16 And now, [r]why tarriest thou? [s]arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, [t]calling on the name of the Lord.

17 And it came to pass, that [u]when I was come again to Jerusalem, even [x]while I prayed in the temple, I was in a trance;

18 And [y]saw him saying unto me, [r]Make haste, and get thee quickly out of Jerusalem: [a]for they will not receive thy testimony concerning me.

19 And I said, Lord, [b]they know that I imprisoned, and beat in every synagogue, them that believed on thee:

20 And when the blood of thy [c]martyr [d]Stephen was shed, I also was standing by, [e]and consenting unto his death, and kept the raiment of them that slew him.

21 And he said unto me, [f]Depart: [g]for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles.

1:16—18.) When, therefore, they found that he spoke so composedly to them, in the Hebrew dialect, they observed a strict silence; and he proceeded to show, that he was a Jew, and not a Gentile or a proselyte; and though born at Tarsus, that he had been educated in Jerusalem by Gamaliel, the most eminent of their Rabbies. (Note, 5:33—39.) At his feet he had been used to sit: according to the custom of those times, when the scholars sat on the ground, or on low seats near the teacher, who was raised above them on a sort of throne. (Notes, Deut. 33:3. Mark 5:14—20. Luke 10:38—42.) Paul had therefore been instructed after the most accurate manner, in the law of Moses, and in the traditions of the elders; and was a zealot for their manner of worshipping God; as he knew them to be zealots at that time. Of this he had given abundant proof, by persecuting those who sought the favour of God, in the "way" of the gospel; doing all in his power to get them put to death, or cast into prison, without distinction, whether men or women. (Marg. Ref. d—m. Notes, 8:3. 9:1,2. 26:9—11. Gal. 1:11—14. Phil. 3:1—7. 1 Tim. 1:12—16.) To this the high-priest, who was then in authority, could bear witness, as well as the other members of the Sanhedrim; for he had received letters from them to the brethren, or the Jews, at Damascus, against the Christians in that city. But he would now relate to them the manner in which he had since that time been induced to embrace and preach that doctrine which he then so furiously persecuted.

Defence. (1) Or, Apology. The sacred writers never use this word, or the correspondent verb, except when the person spoken of defended himself from some charge brought against him. They never in one instance call the authoritative preaching of the gospel an apology. (Marg. Ref. b.) And, whatever may be urged in favour of the word, in this age of apologies, it indisputably conveys the idea of a cautious defensive war against impiety and infidelity, rather than of that boldness and decision with which the cause of God and truth ought to be supported.—Απολογιας. 25:16. 1 Cor. 9:3. 2 Cor. 7:11. Phil. 1:7,17. 2 Tim. 4:16. 1 Pet. 3:15. V. 6—13. (Marg. Ref. 26:12—15. Notes, 9:3—22.) It is evident, that the apostle considered his extraordinary conversion as a most complete demonstration of the truth of Christianity: and when all the particulars of his education, his previous religious principles, his zeal, enmity against Christians, and prospects of secular honours and preferments, by persecuting them, are compared with the subsequent part of his life, and the sudden transition from a furious persecutor to a zealous preacher of the gospel, in which he laboured and suffered to the end of his life, and for which he died a martyr; it must convince every candid and impartial person, that no rational account can be given of this change, except that which he himself assigns: and if that be true, Christianity is divine. (Note, 9:31.)—Heard not the voice, &c. (9) The persons attending the apostle heard a sound, but did not distinguish that articulate voice, in which the Lord Jesus addressed Saul by name. V. 14—16. The God of Abraham had chosen Saul the persecutor, as the object of his special love: in consequence of this, he had also purposed that he should know his will; and "see that Just One," who came to save sinners; and also hear, believe, and obey his voice, as speaking immediately to him. (Marg. Ref. k—o.) This purpose he had begun to effect, as Saul journeyed to Damascus: and he would have further visions of him, and revelations of his will; that he might be fully qualified to be his apostle, a witness of his resurrection, to men of all nations, and likewise of all that he himself had seen and heard. As he had therefore such full proof of the Lord's abundant and gratuitous love to him, notwithstanding his most aggravated crimes, and of his purpose to employ him as his minister; why should he doubt any longer, or hesitate to profess his faith by being baptized, as an outward sign of the washing away of his sins, and the seal, to him and to all true believers, of that blessing, and of "the righteousness of faith," as circumcision had been to Abraham? (Marg. Ref. p—t. Note, 2:37—40. Rom. 4:9—12.) In doing this, he must "call on the name of the Lord," even the Lord Jesus, as the expression generally means: for this invocation of him, as the Son of God, seems to have been one principal part of the required profession of faith in his name. (Notes, 2:14—21. Joel 2:28—32. 1 Cor. 1:1,2.)—'The inference of Chrysostom from this place is this, that by these words he shows that Christ was God; because it is not lawful to invoke any but God.' Whithy. The invocation of saints and angels had not, it seems, at that time, (near the end of the fourth century,) received the sanction of the most eminent Christian ministers.

V. 17—21. The apostle, having shown his hearers in what manner he was induced to become a Christian, and how he was appointed a preacher of the gospel, proceeded to declare the way in which he had been led to exercise his ministry chiefly among the Gentiles; as this was the principal cause of their peculiar rage against him. A considerable time after his conversion, he came up to Jerusalem; and, while worship-

23 And as they cried out, [i]and cast off their clothes, and threw dust into the air, 24 The [k]chief captain commanded him to be brought into the castle, and bade [l]that he should be examined by scourging; that he might know wherefore they cried so against him.

25 And as they bound him with thongs, Paul said unto [m]the centurion that stood by, [n]Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman, and uncondemned?

26 When the centurion heard that, he went and told the chief captain, saying, [o]Take heed what thou doest: for this man is a Roman.

27 Then the chief captain came, and said unto him, Tell me, art thou a Roman? He said, Yea.

28 And the chief captain answered, With a great sum obtained I this freedom. And Paul said, But I was free born.

29 Then straightway they departed from him which should have [p]examined him: [q]and the chief captain also was afraid, after he knew that he was a Roman, and because he had bound him.

30 On the morrow, [q]because he would have known the certainty wherefore he was accused of the Jews, he loosed him from his bands, [r]and commanded the chief priests and all their council to appear, and brought Paul down, and set him before them.

ping in the court of the temple, he was thrown into a trance, or ecstasy, in which he, even the Lord Jesus, appeared to him in vision, and commanded him speedily to leave that city, for the Jews would not receive his testimony concerning him. (Marg. Ref. a—d. Note, 9:23—30.) To this he ventured to object, that as they were in general acquainted with the severities which he had exercised against the Christians, and especially his concurrence in the martyrdom of Stephen; he had a confidence, that they would regard his testimony as to the manner of his conversion, and attend to the gospel as preached by him. But the Lord silenced this plea, and directed him to depart without delay, as he had purposed to employ him at a great distance among the Gentiles. (Marg. Ref. g. Note, 26:16—18.)—Doubtless many who heard the apostle, on this occasion, could well remember the facts to which he referred, and attest them to others. He therefore hoped to convince the multitude, that his labours among the Gentiles were not the result of his own choice, as he earnestly desired to have been useful to his countrymen: but at the same time this mission intimated the approaching rejection of the Jewish nation, as well as the calling of the Gentiles into the church.

V. 22—30. The Jews patiently attended to the apostle's account of his own conversion: but when he declared that he was sent by Jesus himself to preach to the Gentiles; this was so contrary to their bigoted self-preference, their contempt of other nations, and all their religious prejudices, that they would endure no more; so that, in the most furious rage, they cried out, that such a fellow ought to be dragged away to immediate death, for it was "not fit for him to live" on the earth: seeing he thus openly preferred uncircumcised idolaters to the covenanted people of God. (Marg. Ref. h. Note, 1 Thes. 2:13—16.) Amidst these exclamations they cast off their clothes, either as preparing to stone him to death if they could get hold of him, or to express their abhorrence of his supposed blasphemy: and they threw dust into the air, as frantic with rage; or that it might fall and cover them, to denote the greatness of their horror at what had been said. (Marg. Ref. i.) This conduct might well astonish the tribune, who could not possibly understand what had wrought them up to such an excess of fury: he indeed concluded, that Paul had certainly committed some peculiarly atrocious crime with which he was not acquainted. He would not however give him up to their resentment: but, according to the barbarous and irrational practice, in use even among the Romans, (as it is in many nations to this day,) he ordered him to be examined by severe scourging; till the anguish of the stripes inflicted on him, should extort from him a confession of his guilt. When the soldiers were binding him with thongs to a pillar, or block, for that purpose, he demanded of the centurion, whom the tribune had charged with this service, whether it were lawful for them thus to scourge a Roman citizen, who had not been condemned for any crime. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Note, 16:35—40.) A Roman might not be punished before he was legally condemned, nor scourged in this manner at all: which was far more severe, than the scourging with rods: and, as it was even unlawful to bind him with thongs, in order to examination by torture, though not to put fetters upon him in order to confine him; the centurion was led by this question, to caution the tribune to take care what he did; who came to the apostle to inquire whether he really were a Roman. He had himself purchased this valuable privilege for a great sum of money: and as Paul was a Jew apparently in very low circumstances, he questioned him how he had acquired it: but the apostle informed him, that he was free born. He had before mentioned his being a citizen of Tarsus, yet the tribune had not thence inferred, that he was entitled to the privilege of a Roman citizen: so that it is probable, all the citizens of the Roman colonies had not this privilege; or that Tarsus was not a colony. Paul, however, satisfied the tribune that he was a Roman; and so the design of torturing him by scourging, to make him confess some crime which could not be proved, was given up; and the tribune feared lest he should be called to account for having bound him, Instead therefore, of using this method to discover his guilt, he, on the morrow, summoned the council, and brought Paul, freed from his fetters, before them to be examined. Hence we may infer, that a great number of the principal persons in the nation had joined with the multitude in their vehement and outrageous zeal against the apostle.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5. The honour of the gospel requires its advocates to speak with temper, benevolence, and respect to their superiors; as well as with boldness and constancy, in the midst of all the ill usage to which they may be exposed.—A simple narration of the Lord's dealings with us, in bringing us from opposing, to profess and promote his gospel, when it is delivered with modesty and caution, will generally make more impression on the minds of men, than laboured arguments or rhetorical declamations. Indeed, the conversion and experience of some individuals have been so remarkable, that the recital of them has great force of argument in it: though it seldom, if ever, amounts to that complete demonstration of the truth which arose from the change wrought in the character and conduct of the apostle.—Natural abilities, the advantages of education, proficiency in learning, exactness in a system, and a fervent religious zeal according to that system, may be either valuable or mischievous: as they are directed, under the influence of divine grace, in support of the truth, or as employed by men's selfish passions in defence of error. Zeal, especially, is an ambiguous attainment: it may be a violent, cruel, and dreadful flame, kindled from beneath, and destroying all around it with fatal vehemence; or it may be a gentle, active, kind, and heavenly principle, powerfully influencing the possessor to every thing excellent and beneficial, in the persevering use of the most unexceptionable means of obtaining the most important ends. (Note, Jam. 3:13—16.)

V. 6—21. Many, who for a time have devoted their talents to the service of delusion and error, have afterwards been induced to consecrate them to the cause of Christ. The Lord having chosen the sinner, "that he should know his will;" he is awakened, humbled, illuminated, and brought acquainted with Jesus and his blessed gospel. Being acknowledged as a "brother," by those who were disciples before him, he makes profession of his faith, calls on the Redeemer's name, receives the comfort of being "washed from his sins," and testifies to others what he has heard and learned of the Saviour's glory and grace. Thus he passes from Satan's kingdom to that of Christ, and begins to seek its peace and prosperity; while his former associates are surprised, offended or enraged, at the revolution which has taken place. When a man is thus admitted among the servants of Christ, he is often employed in such services as disconcert all his own plans and purposes. Not being wholly weaned from [t] lean-

CHAPTER XXIII.

Paul, pleading his conscientiousness before God, is smitten at the command of the high-priest, whom he reproves for his injustice, 1—3. Being censured for it, he excuses the sharpness of his language, 4, 5. Declaring himself a Pharisee, in respect of the resurrection, a division in the council is excited, 6—9. The chief captain, fearing lest he should be torn in pieces, conveys him back to the castle, 10. The Lord favours him, by a most encouraging vision, 11. Forty Jews conspire to murder him; binding themselves by oath, not to eat or drink till they have done it, 12, 13. They avow their purpose to the chief priests, and secure their concurrence, 14, 15. The conspiracy is discovered to Paul, and from him to the chief captain, 16—22; who sends Paul, under a strong guard, and with a letter, to Felix the governor at Cesarea, 23—35.

AND Paul, [a]earnestly beholding the council, said, [b]Men and brethren, [c]I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day.

2 And the high-priest [d]Ananias commanded them that stood by him [e]to smite him on the mouth.

3 Then said Paul unto him, God shall smite thee, [f]thou whited wall: [g]for, sittest thou to judge me after the law, and commandest me to be [h]smitten contrary to the law?

4 And they that stood by said, Revilest thou God's high-priest?

5 Then said Paul, [i]I wist not, brethren, that he was the high-priest: for it is written, [k]Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people.

[Practical Observations.]

6 But when [l]Paul perceived that the one part were Sadducees, and the other Pharisees, he cried out in the council, Men and brethren, [m]I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee: [n]of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question.

7 And when he had so said, [o]there arose a dissension between the Pharisees and the Sadducees: and the multitude was divided.

8 For the [p]Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel, nor spirit; but the Pharisees confess both.

9 And there arose a great cry: and the scribes that were of the Pharisees' part arose, and strove, ing to his own understanding," he is sometimes reluctant to renounce his favourite plan, even after he has been praying for direction respecting the will of God! A person in these circumstances often imagines that his former friends, having known his contempt and enmity against the truth, will pay the more attention to his testimony on that account; and that his former zeal for some form or party, and against those tenets which he deemed enthusiastical and erroneous, will induce them to inquire into the grounds of the change which has taken place. Perhaps he thinks that their opposition arises mainly from misinformation; and that if the truth were fairly set before them, they could not resist the evidence of it. Thus he may practically forget, that nothing can reconcile the heart of fallen man to the gospel, except the special grace of God; that "a prophet is not without honour save in his own country;" and that a servant of Christ may expect a more favourable hearing from entire strangers than from prejudiced neighbours, relatives, and acquaintance; who commonly treat his attempts to convince them, as a usurpation of authority to which he is not entitled. (Note, Matt. 13:54—58. P. O. 51—58.)

V. 22—30. When the servants of Christ, in obedience to his express command, turn from those who reject their testimony, and seek for more favourable hearers; those whom they leave will sometimes be highly displeased.—Bigotry and spiritual pride are commonly connected with furious wrath and intolerant malice: and it is well for mankind that the power of persecutors is often inadequate to their rage; otherwise they would drive all the servants of Christ out of the earth, as unfit to live upon it. (Note, Heb. 11:35—38.) But the Lord mercifully restrains their madness, by subjecting them to more moderate men. For, though many iniquities have been practised by magistrates, not professing any great regard to religion, even in civilized nations; yet their severity is commonly tender mercy, compared with the cruelty of enraged bigots, when advanced to authority: and their haste in punishing is deliberation and caution, compared with the fury of a licentious mob, when excited by frantic persecutors.—But how great a privilege is it to be governed according to a written law! that if a magistrate is about to act unjustly, it may be demanded of him, whether this be lawful, and suggested to him, to take heed what he does, lest he should expose himself to a judicial rebuke. Christians are allowed to avail themselves of these privileges: our birthright as Britons (who are far more favoured in Providence, than even the Roman citizens were) is not forfeited by our becoming the subjects of Christ; though we should insist upon our privileges with great modesty, prudence, and quietness.—We should, however, most of all value that freedom to which all the children of God are born; and which the largest sums of money cannot, in any measure, purchase for such as remain unregenerate. (Note, and P. O. Gal. 4:21—31.)

NOTES.—CHAP. XXIII. V. 1—5. When the apostle was placed before the Sanhedrim, he steadfastly viewed it, to observe of what persons it now consisted; and as confidently looking at those who formerly employed him in persecuting the Christians: and he then solemnly protested, that he had "to that day lived," or acted as a member of the community, "in all good conscience towards God." The rulers, priests, and people were ready to condemn him as a most atrocious criminal for embracing the gospel, and preaching it to the Gentiles: but he declared that in these things he had not acted from sinister motives, but out of a conscientious regard to his duty, in the sight of God, in which he had persevered amidst many trials to that very time.—He had indeed acted according to his conscience when he persecuted the Christians: but this was the result of pride, ignorance, inattention, and obstinate self-will; and it can hardly be supposed that he would call this "a good conscience before God." The council, however, would have given him credit for that part of his life: his object therefore evidently was, to show that he had acted conscientiously and on good grounds, in those things which they deemed deserving of death; and he doubtless meant more fully to have explained his reasons and motives, if the council would have heard them. (Marg. Ref. a, c.) But the high-priest being a leading person in this prosecution, and aware that Paul's protestation of innocence implied a charge of malice and injustice against his virulent enemies, ordered him to be "smitten on the mouth," for pleading 'not guilty,' when they were determined to condemn him! This was oppressive, iniquitous, and illegal in the extreme: and the apostle immediately denounced the judgment of God upon him for it, and for his other crimes; and declared him to be "a whited wall," or a hypocrite, who might be compared to a wall formed of the meanest materials, but whited over and made to have a fair outside. (Notes, Matt. 23:25—28.) This appeared, in that he, when sitting in the council to judge him according to the law of God, instead of inquiring into the merits of his cause, had ordered him, by a direct violation of that law, to be smitten, before he was proved guilty of any fault, or even impropriety in his behaviour. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Notes, 1 Kings 22:24,25. Jer. 20:1—6. John 18:19—23.)—'Ananias carried it very plausibly towards the citizens, and stood high in their favour: yet he impiously and cruelly defrauded the inferior priests of their legal subsistence, so that some of them even perished for want. And God did remarkably smite him: for after his own house had been reduced to ashes, in a tumult begun by his own son, he was besieged and taken in the royal palace; where, having in vain attempted to hide himself in an old aqueduct, he was dragged out and slain. Doddridge.—But though the answer of Paul contained a just rebuke, and an evident prediction; yet he seems to have been too much carried away by indignation at the base usage which he had experienced: being therefore censured for "reviling God's high-priest;" he pleaded that he was not aware that Ananias was the high-priest. It seems unreasonable to suppose, that the apostle would, in such circumstances, question his title to his office, though the Scripture referred to rather points out Ananias's office as supreme magistrate, than his sacred function. (Note, Ex. 22:28.) It is, however probable, that the apostle meant to allow, that, in the warmth of his spirit, he had not adverted to the person who had given the orders, or was not aware that he was the high-priest. Perhaps the high-priest in the Sanhedrim was not always to be known by his seat, or his garments; and Ananias did not fill that office, when Paul had been more intimately conversant with that assembly. But it is not very clear whether the apostle intended by this concession to wave the question concerning his speaking by "the Spirit of prophecy," as not choosing to insist on it; or whether he allowed that he had spoken too sharply, and could not justify the whole of his answer, or propose it to the imitation of others. V. 6—10. The apostle personally knew many members of the Sanhedrim; and he was aware that there were two parties among them of opposite principles, and very vehement saying, [q]We find no evil in this man: but [r]if a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him, [s]let us not fight against God.

10 And when there arose a great dissension, the chief captain, [t]fearing lest Paul should have been pulled in pieces of them, commanded the soldiers to go down, [u]and to take him by force from among them, and to bring him into the castle.

11 And the night following [x]the Lord stood by him, and said, [y]Be of good cheer, Paul; [z]for as thou hast testified of me in Jerusalem, so [a]must thou bear witness also at Rome. [Practical Observations.]

12 And when it was day, [b]certain of the Jews banded together, [c]and bound themselves [d]under a curse, saying [d]That they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul.

13 And they were more than forty [e]which had made this conspiracy.

14 And [f]they came to the chief priests and elders, and said, We have bound ourselves under a great curse, that we will eat nothing until we have slain Paul.

15 Now therefore ye with the council signify to the chief captain, [g]that he bring him down unto you to-morrow, as though ye would inquire something more perfectly concerning him: and we, or ever he come near, are ready to kill him.

16 And [h]when Paul's sister's son heard of their lying in wait, he went and entered into the castle, and told Paul.

17 Then Paul called [i]one of the centurions unto him, and said, Bring this young man unto the chief captain; for he hath a certain thing to tell him.

18 So he took him, and brought him to the chief captain, and said, [k]Paul the prisoner called me unto him, and prayed me to bring this young man unto thee, who hath [l]something to say unto thee.

19 Then the chief captain [m]took him by the hand, and went with him aside privately, and asked him, [n]What is that thou hast to tell me?

20 And he said, The Jews have agreed to desire thee that thou wouldest bring down Paul to-morrow into the council, [o]as though they would inquire somewhat of him more perfectly.

21 But do not thou yield unto them; [p]for there lie in wait for him of them more than forty men, which have bound themselves with [q]an oath, that they will neither eat nor drink till they have killed him: and now are they ready, looking for a promise from thee.

in their contests with each other; though they were now agreed in persecuting him. (Notes, Matt. 22:15—22. Luke 23:6—12.) Seeing, therefore, they would pay no impartial attention to reason, or facts however authenticated; he attempted to divert their violence from himself upon each other. Accordingly, he cried aloud, "I am a Pharisee, and the son of a Pharisee;" he had been educated in the opinions of that sect, and still maintained the principal doctrines which were controverted between them and the Sadducees: (Marg. Ref. m, n. Notes, 26:4—8. Phil. 3:1—7, v. 5.) nay, indeed, he was called in question at that time for professing the hope, and bearing testimony to the reality, of the resurrection of the dead. The principal fact which he attested as the apostle of Christ, was his resurrection from the dead to be the first-fruits of his people; and all the doctrines of the gospel were intimately connected with that fundamental principle. The first persecution of the church was excited by the testimony of the apostles to the resurrection of their crucified Lord; and the Sadducees took the lead in it, because "they preached through Jesus the resurrection of the dead." (Note, 4:1—3.) The enmity also of many in the council against Paul at this time, was increased by their consciousness that his doctrine was wholly subversive of their favourite sentiment: so that in every way he was called to account for preaching Jesus as risen, and the hope and doctrine of a future resurrection. This was therefore an evident truth: he was not obliged to bring forward all the doctrines which he professed, when not interrogated about them: and it seems to have been entirely justifiable in him, by this seasonable profession of his faith on this controverted point, to draw off the Pharisees from the side of his persecutors; and to induce them to afford him some protection amidst all this illegal violence. At the same time he showed a most consummate sagacity, and a deep acquaintance with the human heart, and of that universal disposition which continually manifests itself, of favouring those who take our part in any contested point, 'Grant me discernment, I allow it you.' Cowper. Accordingly, this declaration was so pleasing to the Pharisees, that their rage was for the time disarmed: and the Sadducees being proportionably exasperated, the two parties began eagerly to dispute about "the resurrection of the dead," and the existence of angels, and of separate spirits; the one contending for these doctrines, and the other arguing against them, with the greatest violence. (Marg. Ref. o, p. Notes, Matt. 3:7—10. 22:23—33.) At length those scribes who espoused the party of the Pharisees, (being sharpened against their antagonists, and perceiving that the apostle's doctrine and narrative tended to establish their tenets, and to subvert those of the Sadducees,) declared that they could not find him guilty of any crime: and, though they did not believe what he said concerning Jesus of Nazareth; yet if an angel, or the spirit of some deceased person, had spoken to him; (as doubtless this had often been done, for thus they assumed the point in contest;) it did not become them "to fight against God," by punishing him. (Marg. Ref. q—s.)—There is a great similarity between this speech and the counsel which Gamaliel had formerly given; and perhaps there was a reference to it, though it is probable that he died before this time. (Note, 5: 33—39.)—The contest, however, at length became so fierce between the parties, that Lysias, who seems to have been present, began to apprehend they would tear Paul in pieces in their fury; and therefore he ordered him to be taken from them by force, and conveyed into the castle. (Marg. Ref. t, u.)—What must this heathen have thought of the worshippers of JEHOVAH, when he saw this assembly of chief priests, learned scribes, and rulers of Israel, forgetful of what became their rank, profession, and sacred character; and carried away by an unbridled rage, in their religious contests, to those excesses which the Roman senators and magistrates or principal persons, would have been ashamed of, even in their eager competition for pre-eminence and dominion?

V. 11. (Notes, 18:9—11. 27:20—26.) The apostle had been repeatedly delivered from the most imminent danger: but he was still confined in prison; and knew that the desperate malice of his numerous enemies would leave nothing unattempted, in order to take away his life. He might, therefore, perhaps, be under some discouragement in respect of his situation: but his gracious Lord was pleased to appear before him, assuring him that he accepted of his testimony concerning him in Jerusalem; and that his desire of attesting his truth at Rome also, would certainly be granted. (Note, 19: 21,22.) This ensured his protection against all his enemies who might "fight with him, but could not prevail against him." (Marg. Ref. Note, Jer. 1:17—19.)—'Here is an instance of a divine appointment, without any necessity laid on the will of Paul.' Whithy. This erroneously supposes, that they, with whom this learned writer meant to contend, held that the divine decrees laid a necessity on the human will! (Notes, 2:22—24, v. 23. 4:23—28, v. 28.) In fact the instance proves, beyond all controversy, that an event may be certainly determined by almighty God, and infallibly come to pass; though all parties concerned exercise the utmost freeagency, of which the rational nature is capable. Some argue from this vision, that the Lord approved of the apostle's conduct: but, though this is undoubtedly true as to the grand outline, yet the vision no more proves that the conduct of the apostle was free from all mixture of infirmity than the vision with which Jacob was favoured at Bethel, proves that he had not sinned in fraudulently obtaining the blessing. (Notes, Gen. 27:6—14. 28:16,17.) The actions of men must be judged of by the law of God; and not by the event, or by any special instances of the Lord's unmerited kindness to them.

V. 12—22. The Jews perceiving that Lysias was resolved to protect Paul, unless legally convicted of some crime, began to fear that their malice would be disappointed. Therefore forty of the most zealous of them, (probably not members of the council, nor yet persons of a low rank,) supposing that they should do God service by murdering his minister, (Notes, 22 So the chief captain then let the young man depart, and charged him, [r]See thou tell no man that thou hast showed these things to me.

23 And he called unto him [s]two centurions, saying, Make ready two hundred soldiers to go to Cesarea, and horsemen threescore and ten, and spearmen two hundred, [t]at the third hour of the night;

24 And provide them [u]beasts, that they may set Paul on, and bring him safe unto [x]Felix [y]the governor.

25 And he wrote a letter after this manner:

26 Claudius Lysias unto [z]the most excellent governor Felix sendeth, [a]greeting.

27 This man [b]was taken of the Jews, and should have been killed of them: then came I with an army, and rescued him, [c]having understood that he was a Roman.

28 [d]And when I would have known the cause wherefore they accused him, I brought him forth into their council;

29 Whom I perceived to be accused of [e]questions of their law, [f]but to have nothing laid to his charge worthy of death or of bonds.

30 And when [g]it was told me how that the Jews laid wait for the man, I sent straightway to thee, [h]and gave commandment to his accusers also, to say before thee what they had against him. [i]Farewell.

31 Then the soldiers, [k]as it was commanded them, took Paul, and brought him by night to Antipatris.

32 On the morrow they left the horsemen to go with him, and returned to the castle;

33 Who, when they came to Cesarea, and [l]delivered the epistle to the governor, [m]presented Paul also before him.

34 And when the governor had read the letter, [n]he asked of what province he was. And when he understood that he was of [o]Cilicia;

26:9—11. John 16:1—3.) conspired together, engaging by a solemn oath, and an anathema, or imprecation of divine vengeance on themselves, if they tasted either meat or drink till they had slain Paul. So far indeed from being ashamed of this most atrocious intended assassination, they gloried in it as highly meritorious! and, knowing that many of the priests and the elders of the council would favour the design; (for the Sadducees seem to have been the more numerous in that assembly;) they informed them of their whole plan, and assigned them the part which they should perform in order to accomplish it; while the guilt or odium of the measure, if there were any, would rest wholly on the conspirators. (Marg. Ref. b—g. Note, 25:1—5.) It is not known by what means Paul's nephew discovered this conspiracy: but as so many persons were privy to it, and as the conspirators aimed to conceal it from Lysias and his friends alone, till it was executed; they might not all be very cautious in speaking of it. Providence, however, took this method of detecting and disappointing it. Paul, though assured of protection, deemed it his duty to use every proper means for his own safety: (Notes, 11. 27:28—32.) and the conduct of Lysias towards the young man showed much affability, good sense, generosity, and regard to truth and equity; which in a heathen, formed a striking contrast to the insidious, violent, cruel, and iniquitous conduct of the Jewish priests and rulers, who were evidently ripe for vengeance. (Marg. Ref. h—r.)—'Such execrable vows as these were not unusual among the Jews, who challenged to themselves a right of punishing those, without any legal process, whom they considered as transgressors of the law; and in some cases thought that they were justified in killing them. . . . It is no wonder, therefore, that these Jews should make no scruple of acquainting the chief priests and elders with their conspiracy against the life of Paul; who were so far from blaming them for it, that not long after they renewed the same design themselves. (25:2,3.) . . . Dr. Lightfoot has shown from the Talmud, that if they were prevented from accomplishing such vows as these, it was an easy matter to obtain an absolution from their Rabbies.' Doddridge. —The Rabbies, however, could not deliver them from the curse of God, which they had imprecated on themselves; though they gave them leave to eat and drink, notwithstanding their vow.

V. 23, 24. The desperate measures of the Jews, no doubt confirmed Lysias in his determination to protect his prisoner; but, by keeping him at Jerusalem, insurrections might have been excited, and some opportunity might have been afforded to his vigilant enemies, of murdering him. He therefore resolved to send him to Felix, the Roman governor, who resided at Cesarea, which is computed to have been about seventy miles from Jerusalem. The body of Roman soldiers, appointed to escort him, consisting of two hundred legionary soldiers, two hundred light-armed foot soldiers, and seventy horsemen, would have sufficed to repel any tumultuary assault of the Jews: but to prevent bloodshed, they were ordered to set off about three hours after sunset, that they might be out of the reach of the zealots before morning. This prudent precaution was accompanied by one equally humane: Paul was not required to walk with the soldiers, who had been accustomed to long and speedy marches; but they were ordered to provide beasts, mules, or horses, changing them when necessary; that he might be conducted safely and conveniently to Cesarea. V. 25—30. This epistle, which is a good specimen of the Roman method of writing letters, may be considered as a model of brevity, simplicity, and perspicuity. The customary title of respect to a superior, and expression of good-will, are once only made use of: and in this it differs exceedingly from modern epistles, to persons of high rank and authority; which are generally incumbered with multiplied compliments, and ascriptions of honour.—Lysias, however, was careful not to intimate to Felix, that he had bound Paul, in order to scourge him; and, as we suppose this to have been an exact copy of the letter, it appears he was willing Felix should conclude, that his interposition in Paul's favour arose from a previous knowledge that he was a Roman citizen; though it is evident this was not the case. (Notes, 21:31—40. 22:22—30.) In other respects the account was fair and candid; and we cannot wonder that a heathen should state his conduct in that light, which was most favourable to his own reputation and advancement, and not likely to injure any man. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5. To rejoice in the testimony of a good conscience before God, amidst calumnies and persecutions, is an invaluable blessing: but this cannot be habitually possessed, except by the constant exercise of faith in Christ, and an upright obedience to his commandments. (Note, 2 Cor. 1: 12—14.)—No rank, learning, authority, religious profession, or sacred function, can change the pride and selfishness of the human heart: but iniquity and oppression are most hateful, when committed in courts of justice, and masked with pretensions to piety. (Notes, Ps. 94:20,21. Is. 10:1—4.) The actors, in such atrocious hypocrisy, are "whited walls" and "painted sepulchres," whom God will smite with distinguished vengeance.—The best of men are liable, when

CHAPTER XXIV.

The high-priest and elders go to Cesarea; and, by Tertullus, accuse Paul before Felix, 1—9. Paul makes his defence, refutes the charges brought against him, and gives an account of his own conduct, 10—21. Felix defers the matter, and shows favour to Paul, 22, 23. Paul reasons before Felix, and Drusilla, his wife, concerning "righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come;" till "Felix trembles," and postpones the subject to a convenient opportunity, 24, 25. He hopes in vain for a bribe to release Paul; and at length, being superseded in his government, he leaves him in prison, to please the Jews, 26, 27.

AND after [s]five days [b]Ananias the high-priest descended with the elders, and with a certain [c]orator named Tertullus, who [d]informed the governor against Paul.

2 And when he was called forth, Tertullus began to accuse him, saying, Seeing that by thee we enjoy great quietness, and that very worthy deeds are done unto this nation by thy providence,

3 We accept it always, and in all places, [f]most noble Felix, with all thankfulness.

4 Notwithstanding, [g]that I be not further tedious unto thee, I pray thee that thou wouldest hear us of thy clemency a few words.

5 For [h]we have found this man a pestilent fellow, [i]and a mover of sedition among all the Jews throughout the world, and a ringleader of [k]the sect of the [l]Nazarenes:

6 Who also hath [m]gone about to profane the temple; [n]whom we took, [o]and would have judged according to our law:

7 But [p]the chief captain Lysias came upon us, and with [q]great violence took him away out of our hands,

8 [r]Commanding his accusers to come unto thee: [s]by examining of whom, thyself mayest take knowledge of all these things whereof we accuse him.

9 And [t]the Jews also assented, saying, That these things were so.

greatly injured and insulted, to be put off their guard: and even that zeal and faithfulness, which the Holy Spirit dictates, in warning sinners of approaching ruin, will sometimes be mingled with the remains of our sinful passions, and prompt us to "speak unadvisedly with our lips." But, whether in reality, or only in appearance, we speak or act inconsistently with the divine precepts; it is in general advisable to decline a strenuous justification of ourselves, and to admit that our conduct was in some respects unfit for imitation: and in no ordinary circumstances should we by any means "speak evil" of our rulers; whatever their characters may be, or however they may have injured us; for the Christian's maxims are, to honour those in authority, and "to overcome evil with good." (Notes, Rom. 13:1—5. Tit. 3: 1,2. 1 Pet. 2:13—17. 2 Pet. 2:10,11. Jude 9,10.)

V. 6—11. "The wisdom of the serpent," as well as "the harmlessness of the dove," is necessary for us, amidst "unreasonable and wicked men." It is useless to urge the most conclusive arguments, when we know that our cause is already prejudged: and it is lawful, on some occasions, to seek the protection of one party against the violence of another, by declaring that we agree with them in many important doctrines; provided this can be said consistently with exact truth. Thus we may sometimes divert the storm which we could not repress, and divide the counsels of the enemies of the gospel.—Among those who oppose spiritual religion, some come nearer to the truth than others: and though self-righteous Pharisees are to be warned and shunned, yet Sadducees and infidels, who deny all the doctrines of revealed religion, should be still more strenuously opposed.—In every controversy, especially relating to religion, an appeal to men's passions and prejudices, and an avowed preference of their tenets to those of their opponents, will generally go further, than either sound arguments, or exemplary conduct, in softening their resentment and securing their esteem. Allow them to have truth on their side, and they will be disposed in some measure to grant you the same: for man is a vain glorious creature, who courts flattery, and would have his own opinion considered as the standard of truth! A practical uniform attention to this characteristic of our fallen nature seems the grand device for managing mankind; whether among the giddy multitude, or in the great councils of nations, or in ecclesiastical conventions. But it is a delicate operation, which requires great skill and caution; and there is imminent danger of deviating from strict "simplicity and godly sincerity," into carnal policy, whenever we have recourse to it: though we may avail ourselves of it on some great emergency; and when it may evidently be done, without at all receding from our principles, and to the advantage of the truth. But what a scandal is it, when the professors and ministers of true religion are so furious in their contests, that idolatrous and ungodly men cry shame of their violence, and are constrained to interpose authority, or military force, to quell the riot, and prevent more fatal consequences! or when national and ecclesiastical assemblies more resemble a meeting of furious assassins, than a convention of legislators, or the servants of God! Yet this has often been the case, and the fury of controversy is not yet extinct.—But the Lord Jesus will be the comfort and refuge of his faithful servants, amidst all dangers and troubles, till their testimony and work be finished: and did their enemies know how sweet their secret consolations are, they would be far less surprised at their fortitude and patience in public.

V. 12—35. The corruption of the best things becomes the worst: erroneous religious principles, zealously espoused by carnal men, dictate such enormities, as others seem scarcely capable of; and thus the most horrid villanies have been perpetrated, not only without remorse, but with exultation.—How careful should we be not to vow and to bind ourselves to what is criminal, or may be impracticable; and not to trifle with oaths and imprecations! For, through neglect of such precautions, men are drawn into wickedness, and expose themselves to vengeance, which way soever they turn themselves: nor will evasions or dispensations, from whatever quarter, extricate them from the snare. All that in this case can be done, is to repent and seek forgiveness of so great a wickedness.—The Lord with perfect ease disappoints the best concerted schemes of iniquity, and detects the most secret devices of his enemies. He has instruments for every work: the natural abilities, or cultivated minds, and moral virtues of heathens, have often been employed, in the protection of his persecuted servants: for they can discern between the unaffected conscientiousness of upright believers, and the zeal of false professors; though they disregard or do not understand their doctrinal principles.—Nothing spiritually good can indeed be found in our fallen nature, except as the fruit of renewing grace: yet a regard to truth, equity, and humanity in social life, is often met with in those who know not God; and indeed is seldom totally overcome, except by false principles, or long habits of vice. This greatly conduces to keep the world in order, and by means of it the Lord fulfils his word to his persecuted people: for all hearts are in his hand, and they are indeed blessed who put their trust in him. (Note, Ps. 84:11,12. P. O.)

NOTES.—CHAP. XXIV. V. 1—9. The high-priest, and elders, considered the prosecution of Paul as so important a national concern, or rather they were so indignant against him and Lysias, that they lost no time in going to Cesarea: so that they arrived there five days after Paul left Jerusalem. —Some think that this was only five days from the time of his being apprehended; and consequently they suppose that more days were spent in his purification: but this is not likely. (Note, 21:27—30.)—In order to render their cause more specious before the governor, they retained a noted orator as their counsel: but disingenuity and falsehood are far more prominent in his speech, than oratorical abilities. He, however, well understood the art of flattery; and lavished high encomiums on Felix, who bore a very bad character. (Note, 24—27.) He panegyrized him, as the author of peace and prosperity to the nation; and as if the Jews had been deeply indebted to his wise foresight, beneficent plans, and prudent administration: and this in language, which at least implied such a profane disregard to divine Providence, as was not customary in the public discourses of the most eminent persons among idolaters. (Marg. Ref. c, e, f.) Yet we read of no benefit whatever, resulting from Felix's oppressive government, except that he freed the country from some daring gangs of robbers.—'All historians agree, that he was a man of so bad a character, that his government was a plague to all the provinces over which he presided. And as for Judea, its state under Felix was so far from being what Tertullus here represents, that Josephus (besides what he says of the barbarous and cowardly assassination of Jonathan the high-priest, by his means) declares that the Jews accused him before Nero of insufferable oppressions; and had certainly ruined him, if his brother Pallas had not interposed in his favour.' Doddridge.—Tertullus however intimated, that he would have enlarged still more in encomiums on Felix, had he not feared being tedious to him; and therefore he entreated him, according to his known clemency, to hear him speak a few words concerning the prisoner. For they had found him to be "a pestilence," a man who infected every one with his pernicious principles, and so became a public nuisance. He had excited the Jews to sedition all over the world; being a ringleader of a most dangerous sect, who professed allegiance to Jesus the Nazarene, and who could not therefore be supposed loyal subjects to the Roman emperor. (Marg. Ref. h—k.) But, waving other particulars, he had just before ventured to profane the temple, by bringing Gentiles into it: and when according to the allowance of the Roman authority, they had apprehended him, and were about to proceed against him, in a legal manner; Lysias had inter-

10 ¶ Then Paul, after that the governor [u]had beckoned unto him to speak, answered, Forasmuch as I know that thou hast been of many years [x]a judge unto this nation, I do the more cheerfully answer for myself:

11 Because that thou mayest understand, that there are yet [y]but twelve days since I went up to Jerusalem for [z]to worship.

12 And they [a]neither found me in the temple, disputing with any man, neither raising up the people, neither in the synagogue, nor in the city:

13 Neither [b]can they prove the things whereof they now accuse me.

14 But this [c]I confess unto thee, that [d]after the way which they call [e]heresy, so worship I [f]the God of my fathers, [g]believing all things which are written [h]in the law and in the prophets:

15 And [i]have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, [k]that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust.

16 And [l]herein do I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offence toward God, and toward men.

17 Now, after many years, I came [m]to bring alms to my nation, [n]and offerings.

18 Whereupon [o]certain Jews from Asia, found me purified in the temple, neither with multitude nor with tumult:

19 Who [p]ought to have been here before thee and object, if they had ought against me:

20 Or else let these same here say, if they have found any evil doing in me, while I stood before the council,

21 Except it be for this one voice, that I cried, standing among them, [q]Touching the resurrection of the dead I am called in question by you this day. [Practical Observations.]

22 ¶ And when Felix heard these things, [r]having more perfect knowledge of that way, he deferred them, and said, [s]When Lysias the chief captain shall come down, I will know the uttermost of your matter.

23 And he commanded a centurion to keep Paul, [t]and to let him have liberty, and that he should forbid none of [u]his acquaintance to minister or come unto him.

posed with a military force, taken the matter out of their hands, and required his accusers to come thither; by whose testimony Felix might be certified of the truth of all these allegations. (Marg. Ref. m—q.)—Almost every clause in this speech contained a palpable falsehood, as every one who compares it with the narrative must perceive: yet the abandoned high-priest and elders, did not hesitate to attest the truth of it! (Marg. Ref. t.)—The high-priest, the chief magistrate of the Jews, was known to be one of Paul's accusers: yet the tribune, a subordinate officer under the Roman governor, commanded these accusers to go to Cesarea. This shows to what entire subjection the Jews were at this time reduced. And was not then "the sceptre departed from Judah" because Shiloh was come? (Note, Gen. 49:10.) —The disciples long before had been named Christians: yet Tertullus still calls them Nazarenes; which shows that the disciples were not first called Christians by their enemies. V. 10—21. 'Tertullus, by a diabolical rhetoric, begins with flatteries and ends with lies: but Paul, relying on a divine eloquence, having made a simple introduction, repels from him, by a true denial, the crime of sedition which had been brought against him.' Beza.—Felix fully knew the disposition and character of these accusers; and, though lavishly flattered, he seems to have paid little regard to their representations. He therefore gave Paul leave to speak in his own defence; who, without seeking to conciliate favour by any compliment, began with observing, that he spake the more cheerfully before Felix, as he had been for some years a judge of that nation; (about seven years, and longer than several of his predecessors:) and so was more competent to understand questions of this nature than a stranger would have been. The apostle then observed, that only twelve days before he had come up to Jerusalem to keep the feast of Pentecost, and to worship according to the law: that he had neither entered into any disputation in the temple, nor excited any insurrection in the synagogues or the city; nor could the least evidence be adduced in proof of the allegations of his accusers, respecting the profanation of the sanctuary. (Marg. Ref. u—b.) Indeed he was free to confess that he worshipped the God of his fathers, in a way which they branded as a heresy or sect; (5) as if it were grounded on pernicious principles, or implied an unlawful separation: but, in fact, he believed the doctrines and promises, both of the law and the prophets, concerning the Messiah; and thus he hoped for the acceptance of God, and expected a future "resurrection both of the just and the unjust," as the Jews in general allowed: for the Sadducees, though high in rank and power, bore but a small proportion in numbers to the rest of the nation. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. c—k.) In this faith and hope, the apostle daily exercised himself after the most careful and diligent manner, to keep his conscience free from all offence, in his whole conduct towards God and man; even as a painter touches and retouches his piece continually, in order to bring it to a more exact resemblance to the objects delineated.—Accordingly after many years absence, he had come to Jerusalem, not as an enemy to his nation, but in a most friendly manner, bringing a sum of money, which he had collected among the Gentiles, to relieve the necessities of his poor brethren; as well as oblations to offer at the temple: and some Jews from Asia had found him in the temple, "purified" according to the law, and neither attended by a multitude, nor making a tumult. These persons ought to have been produced against him, if his prosecutors meant to prove, that he had profaned the sanctuary: but, as they had not thought proper to bring them, knowing that they could testify nothing against him in this respect; let the high-priest and elders declare, whether any crime had been alleged against him, when he stood before the council; except it were criminal to profess his belief of the resurrection, and to assert that he was prosecuted on that account. (Marg. Ref. l, n—q.)—Mayest understand. (11) As knowing that the feast of Pentecost was observed at that time.—God of my fathers. (14) Had Paul worshipped some other god, than the God of Israel, he would not have been entitled to protection by the Roman laws, made in favour of the Jews.—Just and unjust. (15) 'The doctrine of the Pharisees, according to Josephus, restrained the resurrection to the just, condemning the unjust to perpetual torments without any resurrection.' Whitby. (Note, Matt. 22: 23—33.)—Alms, &c. (17) This purpose of St. Paul's journey to Rome, is not before mentioned in the history; but it appears evidently in his epistles: and this shows how little the historian aimed to enhance the credit of his principal character. (Marg. Ref. m. Note, Rom. 15:22—29.)—The apostle's answer refers distinctly to the three charges brought against him, namely, sedition, heresy, and profanation of the temple.

25 And as [z]he reasoned of [a]righteousness, [b]temperance, [c]and judgment to come, [d]Felix trembled, and answered, [e]Go thy way for this time; [f]when I have a convenient season I will call for thee.

26 He [g]hoped also that money should have been given him of Paul, that he might loose him: [h]wherefore he sent for him the oftener, and communed with him.

the charges brought against him by Tertullus were clearly refuted; and, probably, Felix concluded that the prosecution was merely a party matter. Having also more acquaintance with the reports, which had been dispersed, concerning Jesus and his doctrine, than Lysias had, he was more aware of the motives and intentions of the Jews: he therefore deferred the further hearing of the cause, till Lysias came down. He would not gratify the Jewish rulers by condemning a Roman citizen, or delivering him up to their malice; neither would he affront them by releasing him. He, however, allowed him more liberty than he had before; and by his permission the Christians of Cesarea and others might have access to him, which would be comfortable to him and profitable to them. (Marg. Ref. t. Notes, 21:7—14.)—'It seems to me evident, that these words,' (22) 'cannot admit the explication of Grotius and others, that Felix deferred them, that he might have a more exact knowledge of Christianity; but, that having his residence at Cesarea, where Cornelius the centurion and his friends were converted, where Philip the evangelist dwelt, and where there were many disciples; (21:8,16.) he became thus acquainted with the way of Christianity.' Whitby.

V. 24—27. Felix seems to have been absent from Cesarea for a time; and on his return he brought Drusilla with him. She was daughter to that Herod who beheaded James the brother of John; (12:1,2.) and sister to king Agrippa, who is afterwards mentioned. (25:13—27.) She was married to Azizus, king of the Emesenes, who had been circumcised in order to obtain her: but she had left her husband to cohabit with Felix, being a very profligate woman.—Felix had heard many things concerning Jesus and Christianity; (Note, 22,23.) but he was curious to learn a more authentic and complete account of these matters from Paul; as Drusilla also seems to have been. The apostle was therefore sent for, that he might speak before the governor, concerning the "faith in Christ."—What he said concerning the Person, miracles, life, death, resurrection, salvation, and kingdom of Jesus, we know not: but, in order to show his noble auditors the tendency of the gospel, and its importance to them, as well as to others; he reasoned about the nature and obligations of justice, equity, sobriety, temperance, and a proper government of the appetites and passions: and concerning a future judgment assuredly about to take place, when every man, without distinction, must "give an account of himself to God;" and, if found guilty, be punished for his crimes in a most tremendous manner. (Marg. Ref. x—c.)—This was a most suitable, bold, and faithful address of the prisoner, to this powerful, oppressive, iniquitous, and adulterous judge, and his licentious paramour; and a proper method of showing them their need of the repentance, forgiveness, and grace of the gospel. While the licentious Jewess seems to have remained wholly obdurate; Felix was so convicted in his own conscience, that he trembled before his prisoner, from dread of the wrath to come; but, instead of inquiring, "What must I do to be saved?" he abruptly ended the conference, intimating that he was too much engaged at that time to consider the subject any further; but that when he had leisure, he would again send for Paul, and hear his doctrine. (Marg. Ref. d—f.) Thus his terrors and convictions soon subsided; his avarice, and other corrupt passions, retained their full dominion: and, knowing that the Christians were eminently liberal, by general report, as well as by what he had heard of the alms and oblations sent by the apostle to Jerusalem; he hoped that they would buy his liberty with a considerable sum of money. (Marg. Ref. g.) He therefore kept Paul in prison, and frequently sent for him, and talked with him, but not concerning the faith of Christ: and at length, when succeded by another governor; he left the apostle bound, in order to please the Jews by this act of injustice, and so prevent them from accusing him before the emperor. (Marg. Ref. k, l. Note and P. O. Mark. 6:14—29.) But in this he was disappointed; for they accused him of extortion and oppression, and he narrowly escaped punishment on that account. Neither the apostle, nor his friends, would purchase his liberty, by becoming accessary to the bribery and extortion of Felix: they would not "do evil, that good might come."—'It was during the two years of Paul's imprisonment here that those contentions arose between the Jews and Gentiles, as to their respective rights in Cesarea, which, after many tumults and slaughters of the Jews, were inflamed, rather than appeased, by the hearing at Rome, and did a great deal towards exasperating the Jewish nation to that war which ended in its utter ruin.... She (Drusilla) was afterwards... consumed, with the son she had by Felix, in a terrible eruption of mount Vesuvius.' Doddridge.—'It is no wonder that Felix trembled; and that Drusilla did not so also, was an argument of her Jewish confidence, that she might then,' (in the day of judgment,) 'escape by being a daughter of Abraham.' Whitby.—The conduct of the trembling jailer at Philippi and that of Felix, should be carefully and minutely compared; for the contrast is in every particular striking and instructive. (Note, 16:19—34.)—Go thy way. (25) That is, 'Go back to prison.' (Note, 1 Kings 22:26,27.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—21. The selfish and malignant passions of mankind are too commonly the spring of that prompt and persevering activity which generally prevails: and the graces of language and elocution have very commonly been tarnished by falsehood and flattery; and employed rather to mislead men, and prejudice them against the truth, than to influence them to favour and embrace it.—The persecutors of the Lord's people have commonly been the panegyrists of his open enemies: and deviations from truth, by compliments, inure the mind to dissimulation: and thus prepare the way for the most direct slander and false testimony.—In how different a light will the characters of Paul and Felix appear, at the day of judgment, than they do in Tertullus's harangue! Let us not then value the applause, or be troubled at the revilings of ungodly men: as the basest and most criminal of the human race have been almost deified by encomiums, and the excellent of the earth have been treated as "pestilences," as "movers of sedition," and deserving of universal execration; and this by professors of the true religion! by priests, elders, and persons of chief authority in the visible church!—But the servants of God must not attempt, by flattery, to conciliate the favour of those who seem to have the most absolute power over them: nor should they retort on their accusers, further than is necessary for the refutation of their slanders. They should also be ready to confess their faith when called upon, and the foundation of their hope, though they be deemed heretical and sectarian by their enemies; and take occasion to show the agreement of their principles with the word of God, and with the doctrines professed in his church; especially to call men's reflection to the resurrection of the dead, and the future season of righteous retribution. But they have never rightly understood the doctrines of St. Paul, and are not proper persons to plead for them, who do not "exercise themselves to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man." (Note, 1 Pet. 3:13—16.) In a continual application of the blood of Jesus, and an habitual dependence on his grace, we should daily seek to have our conduct and temper more and more conformed to his holy precepts, as the rule of our duty. Thus our actions will recommend our principles; our kindness even to those who injure us will expose the malignity of our accusers; and a sober, righteous, and godly life, will prove the most effectual refutation of all their calumnies.

V. 22—27. Those who are openly irreligious, and even immoral, often show more favour to zealous believers, than hypocritical bigots do: yet their selfish designs commonly prevent them from doing impartial justice.—Many curiously inquire after the faith in Christ, who are utterly averse to its holy tendency. We should not therefore amuse inquirers of this description with speculation, or even bare unapplied scriptural truths; but we ought to "reason with them con-

CHAPTER XXV.

The Jews accuse Paul to Festus, first at Jerusalem, and then at Cesarea, 1—7. He answers for himself, and appeals to Cesar, 8—11. His appeal is admitted, 12. Festus being visited by king Agrippa, opens the matter to him, who desires to hear Paul, 13—22. Paul is brought forth before a most splendid assembly; and Festus states his case to them, 23—27.

NOW when Festus was [a]into the province, after three days [b]he ascended from Cesarea to Jerusalem.

2 Then [c]the high-priest, and the chief of the Jews, informed him against Paul, and besought him,

3 And [d]desired favour against him, that he would send for him to Jerusalem, [e]laying wait in the way to kill him.

4 But Festus answered, that Paul should be kept at Cesarea, and that he himself would depart shortly thither.

5 Let [f]them therefore, said he, which among you are able, go down with me, and accuse this man, [g]if there be any wickedness in him.

6 And when he had tarried among them [h]more than ten days, he went down unto Cesarea; and the next day, [h]sitting in the judgment-seat, commanded Paul to be brought.

7 And when he was come, the Jews which came down from Jerusalem stood round about, and laid many and grievous complaints against Paul, which they could not prove:

8 While he answered for himself, [k]Neither against the law of the Jews, neither against the temple, nor yet against Cesar, have I offended any thing at all.

9 But Festus, [l]willing to do the Jews a pleasure, answered Paul, and said, Wilt thou go up to Jerusalem, and there be judged of these things before me?

10 Then said Paul, [m]I stand at Cesar's judgment-seat, where I ought to be judged; to the Jews have I done no wrong, [n]as thou very well knowest.

11 For [o]if I be an offender, or have committed any thing worthy of death, I refuse not to die: but, if there be none of these things whereof these accuse me, [p]no man may deliver me unto them. [q]I appeal unto Cesar.

12 ¶ Then Festus, when he had conferred with the council, answered, Hast thou appealed unto Cesar? [r]unto Cesar shalt thou go.

cerning righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come;" and to level the word of God against the peculiar vices of their conduct, without fear of their displeasure, how powerful soever they may be. This alone can make them sensible of their need of "faith in Christ," and prepare them to understand the doctrine of the gospel; and such opportunities ought not to be lost.—So great is the power of divine truth, that it can over-awe the consciences of the most potent and profligate, and can make a prince tremble before his prisoner. How then will the wicked be able to stand before the judgment-seat of God?—But many, when thus affected, will hear no more: they will in effect say to the minister or the book that alarms them, nay, to their own consciences, "Go thy way at this time:" they will pretend business, engagements, and impediments, at present; and they hope to be hereafter more favourably circumstanced, or better disposed; and then they will attend to the concerns of their souls. Thus, through procrastination, the hopeful impression wears off: iniquity retains its dominion in their hearts; and the evident love of worldly gain, or some other corrupt indulged propensity, clearly explains the reason of their rejection of the divine message. (Note, John 3:19—21.)—Thus "the convenient time" never arrives; they continue to sin on to the end of life against their better knowledge; and the faithfulness of their reprovers serves only to aggravate their future condemnation. Hence also it is that wicked professors of religion are the most hardened of all sinners; because they have so often and so resolutely done this violence to their own consciences, that they at length become totally callous. (Note, 1 Tim. 4:1—5.) "To-day," therefore, let all that would be saved, attend to the voice of God; "lest he swear in his wrath, that they shall never enter into his rest." NOTES.—CHAP. XXV. V. 1—5. The implacable malice of the high-priest and the rulers against Paul, whose long imprisonment could not soften them; and their dark design of assassinating him, mark the horrible wickedness of the Jews, a short time before their final ruin, of which Josephus gives a most awful account.—It was very wonderful that Festus should refuse to gratify the great men of the nation, which he was appointed to govern, by sending for Paul to Jerusalem; as he stayed in that city long enough to have heard his cause there. But God was pleased thus to influence his mind, in order to Paul's preservation. (Marg. Ref. c—e.)—"When we consider, how much edification to the churches depended on Paul's life, and how evidently, under God, his life depended on this resolution of Festus; it must surely lead us to reflect, by what invisible springs the blessed God governs the world; with what silence, and yet at the same time with what wisdom and energy!" Doddridge.—Able. (5) That is, able to substantiate an accusation; or, able, without material detriment, to take the journey to Cesarea, for this purpose. V. 9—11. Festus, though doubtless more and more convinced of Paul's innocence, being very desirous of acquiring favour with the principal persons among the Jews, proposed to Paul, that he should "go up to Jerusalem," and be judged there before him, in the presence of the council. This proposal renders it the more wonderful, that he did not before send for him to Jerusalem, at the request of the same persons. (Marg. Ref. l. Note, 1—5, vv. 4,5.)—It may be supposed that Festus was not aware of a conspiracy formed against his life: but probably the apostle was fully informed of it; or at least was assured, that no kind or degree of violence or deceit would be wanting to murder him. And, though assured by the Lord himself, that he should "bear testimony to him at Rome," he used all proper means for his own preservation: so far was he from thinking that the divine decrees and man's free agency were incompatible; or that the purposes of God, even when known, render the use of means needless or useless. (Notes, 2:22—24. 4:23—28. 23:11. 27:29—32.)—The Roman governors were the emperor's representatives: the apostle, therefore, as a Roman citizen, when standing at the tribunal of Festus, was in the place where "he ought to be judged;" but should he be sent to Jerusalem to be tried under the influence of the Jewish rulers, he would, independently of plots and conspiracies, be deprived of his privilege. Had any crime been charged upon him, which deserved death, he might have waved this privilege; but as Festus well knew that this was not the case, yet was ready to give him into the hands of his enemies, as a special favour by which he hoped to conciliate them, which no man had a right to do the apostle felt himself authorized, and thought that Festus must see that he did right, in "appealing to Cesar," and demanding that the emperor himself should decide his cause. (Marg. Ref. m—q. Notes, 16:35—40. 22:22—30.)—Nero, who is still infamous for his excessive cruelty, was at that time the Roman emperor.

Festus declared Paul's cause unto the king, saying, [u]There is a certain man left in bonds by Felix;

15 About whom, [x]when I was at Jerusalem, the chief priests and the elders of the Jews informed me, desiring to have judgment against him.

16 To whom I answered, [y]It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die, before that he which is accused have the accusers face to face, [z]and have license to answer for himself, concerning the crime laid against him.

17 Therefore, when they were come hither, [a]without any delay on the morrow I sat on the judgment-seat, and commanded the man to be brought forth;

18 Against whom, when the accusers stood up, they brought none accusation of such things as I supposed:

19 But had [b]certain questions against him of their own [c]superstition, and of one Jesus, [d]which was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive.

20 And because I [e]doubted of such manner of questions, [f]I asked him whether he would go to Jerusalem, and there be judged of these matters.

21 But when Paul [f]had appealed to be reserved unto the [†]hearing of [g]Augustus, [h]I commanded him to be kept till I might send him to Cesar.

22 Then [i]Agrippa said unto Festus, I would also hear the man myself. To-morrow, said he, thou shalt hear him.

23 And on the morrow, when Agrippa was come, and Bernice, [k]with great pomp, and was entered into the place of hearing, with the chief captains and principal men of the city, at Festus's commandment Paul was brought forth.

24 And Festus said, King Agrippa, and all men which are here present with us, ye see this man, [l]about whom all the multitude of the Jews have dealt with me, both at Jerusalem, and also here, crying [m]that he ought not to live any longer.

25 But when I found that he had [n]committed nothing worthy of death, [o]and that he himself hath appealed to Augustus, I have determined to send him.

26 Of whom I have no certain thing to write unto my lord. Wherefore I have brought him forth before you, and [p]specially before thee, O king Agrippa, that, after examination had, I might have somewhat to write.

27 For it seemeth to me unreasonable to send a prisoner, and not withal to signify the crimes laid against him.

(Note, 17:22—25.)—Festus seems to have regarded Paul as a credulous visionary, in affirming that Jesus was alive: but he thought his opponents far more criminal, in persecuting him so virulently on that account; for the matter in contest was in his judgment of no importance!

V. 20. (*Marg. V. 24—27. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Note, 22:22—30.) The motive of Festus, in bringing Paul before this splendid company, evidently was, that he might collect something from Agrippa and those present, which would enable him to write to the emperor in a manner more creditable to himself, and less unreasonable or absurd, than it seemed to him in present circumstances practicable for him. But God had far other and higher reasons for influencing his mind to a measure, in various respects, leading to most important consequences. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12. The malignant enmity of hardened persecutors cannot be worn out by length of time, or satisfied with any sufferings of those against whom they are enraged, unless terminating in their violent death. They deem it a peculiar favour, when rulers will gratify their malice; and they have no scruples about conspiracies, assassinations, or massacres, when legal forms fail of effecting their purposes. We cannot therefore too much watch against the feeblest risings of that principle which may be matured into such dire excesses.—But God limits the rage of the most unprincipled men, by the intervention of others, not at all more conscientious, in many things, than themselves: (Note, Ps. 76:10.) and sometimes he influences them unaccountably to act contrary to their own general purposes, in such particulars as form a part of his plan.—Happy will it be for us, when "many and grievous complaints are brought against us," if our accusers can prove none of them; and if we can show, that we have conscientiously obeyed the civil magistrate, behaved peaceably in the community, and attended to the ordinances and worship of God. (Note, 1 Pet. 4:12—16.) When these things are evident, a man may have great boldness before his judges, in appealing to their consciences with respect to his

CHAPTER XXVI.

Paul, before Agrippa, Festus, and their attendants, declares his manner of life and his hope as a Pharisee, 1—8; his zeal in persecuting the church, 9—11; his wonderful conversion, and call to the apostleship, 12—18; and his subsequent preaching and testimony to Christ, according to the Scriptures, 19—23. Festus exclaims that he is mad, but he mildly denies the charge, 24, 25; and addresses Agrippa, who owns himself "almost persuaded to be a Christian," 26—28. Paul expresses his earnest desire, that every one present were altogether Christians. 29. Agrippa and the company agree with Festus, that Paul is innocent, 30—32.

THEN Agrippa said unto Paul, [a]Thou art permitted to speak for thyself. Then Paul [b]stretched forth the hand, and [c]answered for himself:

2 I think myself happy, king Agrippa, because I shall answer for myself this day before thee, touching all the things whereof I am accused of the Jews;

3 Especially, [d]because I know thee to be expert in all customs and questions which are among the Jews: wherefore I beseech thee [e]to hear me patiently.

7 Unto which promise [n]our twelve tribes, [o]instantly serving God [p]day and night, [q]hope to come: [r]for which hope's sake, king Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews.

8 Why [s]should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead?

9 I verily thought with myself, [t]that I ought to do many things contrary to [u]the name of Jesus of Nazareth.

innocence; or in claiming the protection of the law, against the iniquity of those who long to be gratified by his punishment. But how scandalous is it to the professors and ministers of religion; when the true, exemplary, and zealous servants of God are compelled to appeal from their bigoted malice, to the decision of idolaters, and even to that of the most cruel tyrants, as more likely to do them justice than they are!

V. 13—27. The most important questions, which relate to the worship of God, the way of eternal salvation, and the grand truths of the gospel, appear dubious and uninteresting to the politicians and wise men of the world. They can see, however, and condemn the mismanagement into which men are betrayed by an indiscreet or furious zeal; and this confirms them in their skeptical disregard of religion in general. Yet the day is at hand when Festus and the whole world will know, that all the temporal concerns of the immense Roman empire were frivolous, as the toys and sports of children, compared with the single question, whether Jesus the crucified was risen from the dead, according to the doctrine of the apostle, or was not risen. Then those who have had the means of instruction, and have despised them, will be most awfully convinced of their sin and folly. But alas! many, who seem to desire information on such questions, only want to gratify a vain curiosity, and not to learn the way to heaven: "and the great pomp," with which some of the rich and honourable of this world, attend at "the places of hearing the word of God," nay, at the Lord's table, show, that they are actuated by the same motives as Paul's splendid auditory was, though in a far more aggravated manner.—Ministers indeed do not commonly now stand in fetters, as prisoners, to make their defence before their hearers; yet numbers affect rather to sit in judgment on them, as "offenders for a word," than to learn from them the truth and will of God, for the salvation of their own souls: and alas, too many preachers seem far more anxious to collect together and to please their genteel and splendid congregations; than to "declare the whole counsel of God," and to "keep themselves pure from the blood of all men." (Notes, 20:18—21,25—27. P. O. 13—31.)

NOTES.—CHAP. XXVI. V. 1—3. Agrippa having signified to Paul that he was allowed to plead his own cause, in order that a more authentic account of his case might be sent to the emperor; he stretched out his hand, with a decent action, to give emphasis to his words, according to the manner of the most celebrated ancient orators; and proceeded to state his subject in that manner which was most suited to impress the audience with a conviction of its truth and importance. (Marg. Ref. a, b.)—The subsequent speech has generally been allowed to be peculiarly pertinent, convincing, and suited to the circumstances in which, and the splendid company before whom, it was delivered. He addressed himself immediately to Agrippa, declaring that he deemed it a happy incident, that he was permitted to defend himself from the accusations of the Jews, before one, whose education, and subsequent inquiries and studies, had rendered him so accurately acquainted with all the customs and rites of the Jewish religion, and all the questions controverted among the different sects among the Jews; as he would be far more competent to form a judgment of his cause, than any stranger could be. He therefore besought the favour of a candid and patient hearing, whilst he went through the several particulars which he had to state on the subject. (Marg. Ref. d. Note, 24:10—21, vv. 10,11.)

V. 4—8. 'Paul, dividing the narrative of his life into two parts, cites his adversaries themselves as witnesses of the former part, and the fathers and prophets to attest the latter part.' Beza.—After a brief account of his religion, as a Pharisee, which was the strictest and most exact sect of the nation; and an appeal to the Jews themselves, that he had acted in consistency with that profession from his youth to the time when he became a Christian; the apostle declared that he stood as a criminal to be judged, on account of his professed hope in the promise made by God to their ancestors. Some commentators suppose the apostle to mean, almost exclusively, that the resurrection to eternal life, was "the promise made unto the fathers:" but it is manifest, beyond all doubt, that the promise of a Saviour was the most prominent part of the revelation made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and the grand subject of prophecy; (Marg. Ref. m. Notes, Luke 24:44—49. John 5:39—44. Heb. 11:39,40. 1 Pet. 1:10—12. Rev. 19:9,10.) while the doctrine of the resurrection was not so fully and plainly revealed in the Old Testament, as it is in the New. (Note, 2 Tim. 1:10.) St. Paul says, elsewhere, "We declare unto you glad tidings, how that the promise which was made unto the fathers, God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children; in that he hath raised up Jesus again." (Notes, 13:24—37. Rom. 1:1—4, v. 4.) Thus the resurrection of Jesus demonstrated that he was the promised Messiah, against all the unbelieving Jews; and the doctrine of the resurrection, against the Sadducees. The latter were instigated to persecute the apostles, for "preaching through Jesus the resurrection of the dead;" (Notes, 4:1—3. 23:6—10.) the former, for preaching the very person whom they had crucified, as the Messiah, and as risen and "exalted to be a Prince and Saviour." Yet the whole nation expected a Messiah; and all, except the Sadducees, professed to believe the doctrine of the resurrection. In general, all that remained of the twelve tribes, wherever dispersed, hoped for the accomplishment of the promise concerning the Messiah, and a resurrection to eternal life through him: and their constant worship at the temple, morning and evening, as well as their other frequent and incessant religious observances, implied the same hope. (Marg. Ref. o—q.) And as the resurrection of Jesus was proved, by most unexceptionable and abundant testimony, and might be shown to be the fulfilment of ancient prophesies; what reason could be given, why it should not be credited?—"Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead?" Is not the great Creator able to restore the dead to life again? And cannot sufficient reasons be assigned for his omnipotent interposition, that his truth may be attested, his worshippers encouraged, and his name glorified? (Marg. Ref. r. Note, John 20:24—29.) Thus the apostle makes a natural and easy transition, from the hope of their fathers, and the doctrine of the resurrection, to that which was his principal subject; namely, the proof which he intended to adduce, that Jesus was indeed risen, and was the promised Messiah.—Some render the eighth verse thus, "What! is it a thing incredible with you, if God raises the dead?" and this indeed gives a peculiar animation to the question. V. 9—11. The apostle acknowledged that he himself had formerly been extremely prejudiced against the gospel, and had thought it his duty to do many things "contrary to the name of Jesus," who was usually in contempt called "the Nazarene." (Marg. Ref. s, t.) Accordingly he had, at Jerusalem, by the authority of the chief priests, imprisoned many of those excellent persons whom he now knew to be "the saints" and holy servants of God: and when any of them were condemned to death by the council, he had approved and applauded the sentence, and promoted its execution. He had also by means of scourging and other severities, in all the synagogues, and by threatening death, compelled many professors and favourers of Christianity, to deny and revile the Saviour as a deceiver, in language which he now thus publicly declared to be blasphemy; and in every respect he was enraged against them to a degree, which might justly be regarded as the excess of madness and insanity. V. 16—18. It is evident that this commission was given to Paul by our Lord, at the time of his conversion; though not mentioned in the compendious narrative of that event. (Note, 9:15,16.)—'The words make a part of the sentence, in which Christ bids him rise from his astonishment, into which his appearance to him, in the way to Damascus, had thrown him.' Doddridge.—Jesus called on him to arise from the earth, as prepared to receive and execute his mandates. He had appeared to him, not to destroy him, but to appoint him a minister of his gospel, and a witness to all men; not only of this vision, but of many other things which he would afterwards reveal to him from time to time. (Marg. Ref. n—o.) For executing this ministry, the Jews would indeed seek to kill him; but Jesus promised to deliver him from them, and from the Gentiles, to whom he now gave him a commission to preach his salvation. (Marg. Ref. p, q.) The end and effect of his ministry among them, through the power of the Holy Spirit accompanying his word, would be "to open their eyes:" for, though their bodily eyes were open, and their intellectual powers, in secular matters, might be very penetrating; they had notwithstanding been hitherto spiritually blind, through the influence of the devil, and the depravity of their carnal minds; so that they could see nothing of the glory of God, of his truth and will, or of the way of acceptance and holiness. But, by the change to be wrought in their minds by divine grace, and the instructions of his word, they would be turned from the darkness of ignorance, error, and wickedness, to the light of divine knowledge, truth, and holiness; and from those idolatries and vices, by which they worshipped and served Satan, as his bond-slaves, to the holy worship and service of the living God; that, through the gospel they might receive a full pardon of all their sins, and be made heirs of that heavenly inheritance, to which all those who are renewed to holiness will be admitted, by faith in him as the Saviour of lost mankind. (Marg. Ref. r—z. Notes Is. 42:5—7,13—17. 49:5—13. Matt. 4:12—17. Luke 1:76—79. 4:16—19. Eph. 5:8—14. Col. 1:9—14. 1 Pet. 2:9,10.) —The distinction between "opening their eyes, and turning them from darkness to light," should be particularly noticed Had the eyes of the ignorant Gentiles been opened by divine grace, and no light of scriptural instruction given them; they must still have groped in the dark, as a seeing man does in a dark room: had the light of truth been sent, but the illumination of the Holy Spirit withheld; their condition would have resembled that of blind men in the full light of day. But adequate instruction was given them by the gospel, and their minds and hearts were prepared to receive it by regeneration. Paul received this commission to the Gentiles, at the time when he was converted; yet he did not preach to any but Jews and proselytes, till after Cornelius had been converted by the ministry of Peter: for he waited for farther intimations of the Lord's will, as to the time and manner in which he was to set about that important service; and perhaps he did not fully understand, at first, the import and extent of his charge.—To interpret the language of this passage, as if it were exclusively applicable to idolaters, implies an opinion that nominal Christians are of a better nature than other men; or that pride, covetousness, and all the other vices by which men are enslaved to Satan, are not so heinous in professed Christians, as they are in heathens! Gross idolatry indeed has been, in this part of the world, exchanged for irreligion, infidelity, superstition, formality, and hypocrisy, among nominal Christians: but the hearts and minds of the unregenerate and unconverted are as much blinded by aversion to spiritual religion, and by the love of the world and of sin, as those of the ancient Gentiles were. 'Those who call themselves Christians, because they happen to be born in a Christian country; but attend neither to the doctrines, nor the duties of the gospel, seem to differ but little, with respect to the point under consideration, from those to whom the gospel was first preached: the process in both must be nearly the same.' Bp. Tomline's Refutation of Calvinism.—May it not be added, 'Because they have been baptized with water?'—By faith, &c. (18) 'This may be referred to sanctified; .. but the sentence is much fuller, if we join it with the word receive.' Beza. No doubt we are "sanctified," as well as "justified," by faith in Christ; but the words under consideration seem to show, that all the blessings mentioned are received by faith in Christ, and not one of them only.

V. 19—23. The apostle next intimated to king Agrippa, that it could not be supposed he would refuse obedience to a vision, which was so evidently from heaven. Accordingly, he began to preach first to the Jews at Damascus, whither he went to persecute the Christians, and then in other places, should [f]repent and [g]turn to God, [h]and do works meet for repentance.

21 For these causes [i]the Jews caught me in the temple, and went about to kill me.

22 Having therefore [k]obtained help of God, I continue unto this day, [l]witnessing both to small and great, saying [m]none other things than those which [n]the prophets and Moses did say should come;

23 That [o]Christ should suffer, and that he should be [p]the first that should rise from the dead, [q]and should show light unto the people, and to the Gentiles. [Practical Observations.]

24 ¶ And as he thus [r]spake for himself, [s]Festus said with a loud voice, [t]Paul, thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad.

25 But he said, [u]I am not mad, [x]most noble Festus; but speak forth [y]the words of truth and soberness.

26 For [z]the king knoweth of these things, before w[a]om also I speak freely: for I am persuaded that none of these things are hidden from him; for [b]this thing was not done in a corner.

27 King Agrippa, [c]believest thou the prophets? I know that thou believest.

28 Then Agrippa said unto Paul, [d]Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian.

29 And Paul said, [e]I would to God, [f]that not only thou, but also all that hear me this day, were both almost, and altogether such as I am, [g]except these bonds.

30 ¶ And when he had thus spoken, [h]the king rose up, and the governor, and Bernice, and they that sat with them.

31 ¶ And when they were gone aside, they talked between themselves, saying, [i]This man doeth nothing worthy of death, or of bonds.

32 Then said Agrippa unto Festus, This man might have been set at liberty, if he had not [k]appealed unto Cesar.

and at length to the Gentiles; calling on them to repent of all their sins, to turn to the worship and service of God, and to live holy lives, as became true penitents; and thus to expect the mercy and favour of God through Jesus Christ. (Marg. Ref. b—h. Notes, 20:18—21. Matt. 3:7—10. Luke 3:7—14.) "For these causes the Jews," being exasperated with him, for declaring that Jesus whom they had crucified was the Messiah, and for preaching to the Gentiles, seized on him in the temple, and would have murdered him, if they had not been prevented; but, having obtained help from God, by means of Lysias, Felix, Festus, and others, his life had hitherto been preserved; and he had employed it in testifying to the poorest of mankind, as well as to the rich and honourable, with equal plainness and faithfulness, the grace of the gospel. In doing this he had said nothing but what entirely accorded to the types and predictions of the law, as well as to the express and repeated language of the prophets, and even of Moses their great lawgiver. As these foretold that the promised Messiah would suffer and die, and yet that he would reign in a most glorious manner: and consequently that he should rise from the dead, as the first-fruits of the resurrection; and that he was to show the light of salvation, not only to the people of Israel, but to the Gentiles also. V. 24—29. While Paul was confirming his testimony to the resurrection and glory of Jesus, by the predictions of Scripture; and probably was preparing to adduce more particular proof, from the prophets, to each part of his doctrine; he was suddenly interrupted by Festus. He had never heard any thing before on these subjects; the resurrection of Jesus, and the vision of Paul, appeared to him incredible, or visionary in the highest degree. Probably he was astonished to hear him speak of his doctrine as of universal concernment; and aver that one, who arose among the despised Jews, was appointed to be "the Light of the Gentiles," even of the philosophical Greeks and Romans. He therefore said in a loud voice, audible by the whole assembly, "Paul, thou art beside thyself, &c." He perhaps had observed, that the apostle spent much time in retirement, study, and reading; and he supposed that, having studied very closely about certain abstract and visionary matters, his over-attention had deranged his intellects: so that he could not deem him fit either to be blamed or credited; but to be an object of mere compassion. (Marg. Ref. s, t. Notes, 9—11. 2 Kings 9:11. Jer. 29:24—32. Mark 3:20,21. 2 Cor. 5:13—15.) To this rude interruption before so large and splendid an audience, the apostle calmly and gravely replied, addressing the governor by the customary title of "most noble," or "most excellent;" assuring him, that he "was not mad;" and that he declared nothing but what was altogether true, of the highest importance, and able to stand the test of the most deliberate investigation. Indeed "king Agrippa" was acquainted with these subjects: the events respecting the miracles, doctrine, death, and reported resurrection of Jesus, and the subsequent promulgation of Christianity, could not have been hid from one who was so well informed in all the affairs of the Jews; for these things had not been transacted in an obscure "corner but in the most public manner imaginable. (Marg. Ref. u, x, a.) He would therefore inquire of Agrippa, whether he did indeed believe, that the old prophets spake by divine inspiration, and that their predictions would be certainly fulfilled. He however knew that he would answer in the affirmative, for he doubted not but he did in this respect believe them: and he only desired Agrippa to examine, whether they had not exactly been fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth.—This appeal to the Scriptures, joined to the apostle's other arguments, had so great an effect upon Agrippa's mind, that he could not conceal his convictions; but openly declared, that Paul had "almost persuaded him to be a Christian." His understanding and judgment were for the time convinced, but his heart was not changed: (Note, 2 Cor. 4:1,2.) and he must have been aware, that the sacrifices to be made, and the cross to be sustained, would in his case be very great. So that while he was more candid, and just in his government than others of his family; his conduct and temper were widely distant from the spirituality and humility of the gospel. The apostle, however, desirous to fix the impression upon his mind, replied, in the genuine spirit of Christian love, that he earnestly wished and prayed that not only he, but every one in that large and splendid assembly, might not only "almost," but "altogether," embrace and be established in the faith of the gospel, and partakers of all its substantial blessings and consolations; and in short, entirely like himself in every thing, except in his bonds and imprisonment, which he would wish to bear alone. This most benevolent wish implied his full conviction of the truth of the gospel; the absolute necessity of faith in Christ in order to salvation; his own happiness as a Christian, even in his bonds; his opinion that Agrippa, Festus, and others present, did not then believe; and his fear that they would reject the gospel to their final condemnation.

V. 30—32. Agrippa, like Felix, seems to have been made very uneasy, and even alarmed, by St. Paul's convincing and impressive address: he was therefore the first to dismiss the subject, and to retire from the place of hearing. (Note, 24:24—27.) His opinion, that Paul was innocent, and might have been liberated, had "he not appealed unto Cesar," would give Festus a more favourable opinion of him: but it does not appear, that either of them, or any of those present, inquired further after Christ and his salvation: and this m st

CHAPTER XXVII.

Paul, attended by some friends, sails as a prisoner towards Rome, and is kindly used by the centurion sent with him and other prisoners, 1–3. He foretells the danger of the voyage, but is not credited, 9–11. Sailing against his advice, the company are exposed to a most violent and long-continued tempest, and are in extreme danger, 10–20. Paul, encouraged by an angel, assures them that all their lives shall be preserved, but that the ship shall be wrecked, 21–26; the whole of which exactly comes to pass, 27–44.

AND [a]when it was determined that we should sail into [b]Italy, they delivered Paul, and certain other prisoners, unto one named Julius, [c]a centurion of [d]Augustus' band.

3 And the next day we touched at [i]Sidon. And [k]Julius courteously entreated Paul, and gave him liberty to go unto his friends to refresh himself.

4 And when we had launched from thence, we sailed under [l]Cyprus, because [m]the winds were contrary.

admirable speech of the apostle seems to have been peculiarly unsuccessful, as to the event of it at that time. (Note, 17:32—34.)—Learned men have shown, that no laws against the Christians had at this time been enacted by the Roman legislature.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. The Lord will never fail to give those, who for his cause are called to appear before kings, and rulers, and councils, "a mouth and wisdom, which none of their adversaries shall be able to gainsay or resist." (Notes, 6:9—14, v. 10. Matt. 10:19,20. Luke 21:12—19, v. 15.)—When Christian love abounds in the heart, it dictates a sincere language, far surpassing all compliment and worldly politeness; and teaches us to "render honour to whom honour is due," without flattery or fear of man.—That religious knowledge which unconverted men acquire, and their "expertness" about customs and questions in divinity, in general lie dormant, as mere learned lumber, in the understanding: yet, when attended with a measure of candour, they are thus rendered more accessible to truth, and more competent to judge of the evidence adduced in support of it. Nor is it any flattery to give such men the credit of their attainments; or improper to entreat a "patient" hearing, when the subject might demand the most reverent attention. (Note, Philem. 8—11.)—A moral conduct, and a form of godliness, are often connected with a bigoted aversion to the gospel; and this leads to many other heinous crimes: yet it is a mercy to be preserved, during our unconverted years from, those vices which might afterwards disgrace our characters among worldly people, and so prevent the influence of our testimony: and this is greatly corroborated, when they, who "knew our manner of life from our youth," could testify that we then acted consistently with our principles, and according to what we thought right; for they may thence infer, that our change of sentiment and conduct also originated from a regard to duty.—Men are often censured and persecuted for professing their hope in the express promises of God, and for a consequent expectation of the resurrection, and future state of righteous retributions: and numbers repeat creeds, subscribe doctrines, and join in forms of worship, habitually, and with apparent earnestness; and yet condemn others for explicitly professing the truths contained in them! Many things are "thought incredible," because the infinite nature and perfection of that God who has revealed, performed, or promised them, are overlooked; and because men will not see how his power and glory are concerned in them. (Note, Matt. 22:23—33, v. 29.)—Those who have been most strict in their conduct, previous to conversion, will afterwards see abundant cause for deep humiliation, even on account of things, which at the time they "verily thought they ought to do:" their contemptuous or injurious treatment of the saints, their opposition to the gospel, and endeavours to seduce, reason, or terrify others into a neglect of it, will often sit very heavily on their minds; and they will condemn those words as impious and blasphemous, which they once uttered, or excited others to utter, without remorse; and allow that conduct to be madness, in which they once gloried.

V. 12—23. The true convert can give "a reason of his hope;" and a good account of the change which has taken place in him, even when there is nothing extraordinary in his experience. (Note, 1 Pet. 3:13—16.) Having been convinced of his guilt and danger, as a transgressor of God's law, and a stranger to his grace, or a despiser of it; he was led to seek for mercy, and to believe in the Lord Jesus; and, being encouraged with the hope of acceptance, of increasing light, and of continued protection, he began to employ himself in his service. Thus the Lord reconciles sinners to himself, and sometimes "commits to them the word of reconciliation:" he sends them to their fellow-sinners, to "beseech them in his stead to be reconciled to him;" (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:18—21. 6:1,2.) and, by his power attending their word, he "opens their eyes, turns them from darkness to light, delivers them from the kingdom and power of Satan," forms them spiritual worshippers of God, forgives their sins, adopts them into his family, sanctifies them by his grace, and brings them to his heavenly inheritance, by faith in his name. (Note, 1 Thes. 1:9,10.)—Those who are thus enlightened and favoured will not be "disobedient" to the commands of the Redeemer: and all who understand and preach the gospel will perceive, that it contains directions, motives, and encouragements, to "repent, and turn to God, and to do works meet for repentance," addressed to men, as sinners, without discrimination; and, that it has no saving efficacy on the heart, where these fruits do not clearly appear in the life. (Notes, Tit. 2:11—14. 3:4—8.) Yet, for calling on men thus to "repent and be converted;" and for "witnessing none other things," than what are evidently contained in the Holy Scriptures; what numbers have been execrated, persecuted, and slain, even by the professed worshippers of God! So that it is owing to the peculiar help and protection of God, when zealous and laborious preachers of the gospel are preserved from the violence of the wicked, and have their lives, and opportunities to bear their faithful testimony, continued to them: but let who may be the instruments, they should give the whole glory, both of their protection, and of their persevering faithfulness and diligence to God alone.

V. 24—32. The persons whom God employs to protect his servants, often despise them as visionaries or madmen, for being so zealous about invisible objects, for believing subjects so mysterious, crediting facts of so extraordinary a nature; and relating their experience of the way in which the Lord brought them to trust in his grace, and embrace his gospel; and for attesting that the same faith and diligence, and an experience in many respects similar, are indispensably necessary to all men, both small and great, in order to their salvation. Indeed few ascribe the madness of modern teachers to deep study, or much learning: but they rather impute it to weakness of intellect, or contemptible ignorance; whatever evidences they give of good sense, enlarged minds, and extensive knowledge in other subjects. But as apostles and prophets, nay, the Son of God himself, were exposed to this obloquy; let us not be moved, if those who deemed us sober and intelligent, when we were "exceedingly mad," should set us down for insane, when divine grace has brought us to ourselves, and made us wise unto salvation. (Note, Luke 15:17—19.) Yet let us be careful, in these circumstances, to speak with temper; that we may disprove the charge by a dispassionate conduct, as well as by "the words of truth and soberness." We should likewise cautiously avoid all real enthusiasm, and whatever is ambiguous or incapable of being supported by appropriate evidence: whilst we deny, and attempt to refute the charge of being visionaries and fanatics.—It is highly important for us to lead men's attention by clear instructions, conclusive arguments, and well authenticated facts, to the sacred oracles, as the standard of truth; and, while we inquire whether our hearers do indeed believe the Scriptures, we should, as much as may be, take it for granted that they do: for many assent to the truth of the Bible, and pay a respect to testimonies from it, who have not yet understood or received the doctrines or salvation there revealed. Arguments and testimonies of this kind "almost persuade" numbers to be Christians, who yet are never wholly induced to leave all for Christ. When this is the case, they often grow weary of hearing the truth, and sin away conviction: and their own confessions eventually increase their condemnation: for rejecting the gospel, out of love to the world, and sinful pleasures. While we beware of this fatal hesitation and irresolution in our own conduct: and recollect how far being "almost persuaded to be a Christian" is from being altogether such a one as Paul was, or even as every true believer is; we should endeavour to impress still more deeply the minds of those who are under serious convictions of the truth. In doing this, the language of fervent, disinterested affection, is peculiarly becoming: and we should sincerely desire and pray, that others may participate all our hopes and comforts, and be exempted from our crosses and trials. Yet even this beautiful philanthropy, when expressed in the most graceful and conciliatory language, will fail to recommend the holy gospel to the carnal hearts of worldly men. They will grow weary of subjects and reflection so humiliating and solemn; and even, when they deem the preacher a man of integrity, and cannot but think he has truth on his side, they will not allow his "saving to be worthy of all acceptation;" or faith in Christ, producing prompt obedience to his precepts, to be absolutely necessary to their salvation. Alas! how many such persons have been "almost persuaded to be Christians," who, nevertheless, at last perished in their sins! God grant that none who read these observations may be found in that unhappy number!

NOTES.—CHAP. XXVII. V. 1, 2. 'Paul, among prisoners indeed, and through various forms of death, yet distinguished by many splendid testimonies, is led to Rome, as by the hand of God himself.' Beza.—It was determined, by Festus and his council, to send Paul, with some other prisoners,

5 And when we had sailed over the sea of [n]Cilicia and [o]Pamphylia, we came to Myra, a city of Lycia.

6 And there [p]the centurion found a ship of [q]Alexandria sailing into Italy; and he put us therein.

7 And when we had sailed slowly many days, and scarce were come over against Cnidus, the wind not suffering us, [r]we sailed [s]under [*]Crete, over against Salmone;

8 And, hardly passing it, came unto a place which is called, the Fair Havens; nigh whereunto was the city of Lasea.

9 ¶ Now when much time was spent, and when sailing was now dangerous, because [t]the fast was now already past, Paul admonished them,

10 And said unto them, Sirs, [u]I perceive that this voyage will be with hurt and much [†]damage, not only of the lading and ship, but also of our lives.

11 Nevertheless the centurion [x]believed the master and the owner of the ship, more than those things which were spoken by Paul.

12 And because [y]the haven was not commodious to winter in, the more part advised to depart thence also, if by any means they might attain to Phenice, and there to winter; which is a haven of [z]Crete, and lieth toward the southwest and northwest.

13 And when [a]the south wind blew softly, supposing that they had obtained their purpose, loosing thence they sailed close by Crete.

14 But [b]not long after there [‡]arose against it [c]a tempestuous wind, called Euroclydon.

15 And when the ship was caught, and could not bear up into the wind, [d]we let her drive.

16 And running under a certain island, which is called Clauda, we had much work to come by the boat:

to Italy; that at Rome he might be judged by the emperor, to whom he had appealed: and he was, according to the general custom, committed to the care of a centurion with soldiers under him. As this centurion belonged to the emperor's own cohort, or regiment, it is probable that he was going to Rome on other business. (Marg. Ref. a—d.)—Adramyttium was a city of Mysia, on the coast of Asia; this ship, therefore, if only returning thither, could convey the company but a small part of their long voyage.—Aristarchus, of whom mention has repeatedly been made, is called by the apostle, his "fellow prisoner;" yet it is likely, that this was rather by choice than compulsion. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Note, Col. 4:9—14, v. 10.)—The historian himself likewise attended the apostle, and so speaks in the first person plural, in many parts of the narrative. This was a singular instance of the great affection of Luke and Aristarchus for the apostle, and a great solace to him under all his trials: and they would be m many ways assis'ant to him, in all his plans for usefulness, both during the voyage and after he arrived at Rome.

It may be supposed, that the opinion of Festus, and the concessions made by king Agrippa, had induced this centurion to treat Paul with attention and kindness; regarding him perhaps as an injured man, and bearing some degree of respect for his integrity and talents.—It is probable, that there were Christians at Sidon at this time, though nothing further is recorded concerning them. V. 9. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Lev. 16:29—31. Jer. 36:6,7.) The fast, or great day of atonement, was in the seventh month, or the latter end of September, when sailing was thought dangerous: for, in that imperfect state of navigation, the mariners commonly kept within a moderate distance from the shore, and seldom put to sea during the winter season.—Some commentators suppose, that the Michaelmas-flows, which are peculiar to the Mediterranean sea, are referred to: but, I apprehend, that at present the Mediterranean is navigated at Michaelmas, and in winter, as well as other seas.

V. 10. The apostle doubtless had an intimation from God of the approaching storm: and foresaw that much damage would be sustained by it, and their lives exposed to great danger; though the particular event of it was not as yet made known to him. (Marg. Ref. u. Note, 20—26.) The centurion, and all on board the ship, must have had some genera. knowledge of Paul's character and principles; and the religious converse and worship of him and his friends, as well as their whole behaviour, must have excited attention: yet they probably regarded them as deluded men; entitled indeed to civil usage, being very inoffensive and well meaning, yet not worthy of notice as to their religious opinions. But it was the Lord's purpose to exhibit Paul among them, as a most extraordinary person; that they might learn to inquire after his principles, and receive his instructions.

V. 14, 15. This tempest came from the east as its name imports: yet it violently and frequently shifted its direction, and thus excited so tremendous an agitation of the waves, that the ship could not in any way be managed, during the storm. 17 Which when they had taken up, they used helps, undergirding the ship; and, [e]fearing lest they should fall into the quicksands, strake sail, and so were driven.

18 And we being exceedingly tossed with a tempest, [f]the next day they lightened the ship;

19 And the third day [g]we cast out with our own hands the tackling of the ship.

20 And when [h]neither sun nor stars in many days appeared, [i]and no small tempest lay on us, [k]all hope that we should be saved was then taken away.

[Practical Observations.]

21 ¶ But, [l]after long abstinence, Paul stood forth in the midst of them, and said, Sirs, [m]ye should have hearkened unto me, and not have loosed from Crete, and to have gained this harm and loss.

22 And now [n]I exhort you to be of good cheer: [o]for there shall be no loss of any man's life among you, but of the ship.

23 For [p]there stood by me this night the angel of God, [q]whose I am, [r]and whom I serve, 24 Saying, [s]Fear not, Paul; [t]thou must be brought before Cesar: and, [u]lo, God hath given thee all them that sail with thee.

25 Wherefore, sirs, be of good cheer: for [v]I believe God, that it shall be even as it was told me.

26 Howbeit we must be cast upon [w]a certain island.

27 But when [x]the fourteenth night was come, as we were driven up and down in Adria, about midnight [y]the shipmen deemed that they drew near to some country;

28 And sounded, and found it twenty fathoms: when they had gone a little further, they sounded again, and found it fifteen fathoms.

29 Then fearing lest they should have [b]fallen upon rocks, they cast four [c]anchors out of the stern, [d]and wished for the day.

30 And as the shipmen were about to flee out of the ship, when they had let down [e]the boat into the sea, under colour as though they would have cast anchors out of the [f]foreship, 31 Paul [g]said to the centurion and to the soldiers, [h]Except these abide in the ship, ye cannot be saved.

32 Then [i]the soldiers cut off the ropes of the boat, and let her fall off.

V. 20—26. The mariners could not make any usual observations, because the sun and stars were totally hidden by clouds; they were not able, therefore, to discover to what part of the sea they had been driven: and, as the tempest still lay hard upon them, and allowed them no respite to repair their shattered vessel, they gave up all for lost; and expected every moment to go to the bottom, or to be dashed upon the rocks. (Marg. Ref. h—k.) This prepared them to regard the words of Paul, which in other circumstances they probably would have contemptuously neglected. As he had before been assured of bearing testimony to Jesus at Rome, he was probably composed during the whole tempest; but the Lord was pleased to send him further assurances, respecting his own preservation, and that of all the company. (Note, 23:11.) After they had all neglected, for some time, to take proper sustenance, through the terror of immediate death; and after Paul and his friends had, perhaps, spent some time in prayer; he stood forth before the mariners, and reminded them of the divine admonition he had before given them, which they ought to have unreservedly obeyed: (Marg. Ref. l, m. Note, 10.) and by neglecting of which they had "gained" nothing of what they had expected, but only exposed themselves to great injury and disgrace. He, however, exhorted them to be of good courage, for he was authorized to assure them of the preservation of all their lives. For that God, whose he was in an especial manner, whom he worshipped continually, and whom he served with all his powers and capacities, by preaching the gospel of his Son, (Marg. Ref. n—r. Notes, Dan. 6:10—23. Rom 1:9—12.) had sent his angel, (who knew where to find him, though they knew not where they were,) and by him God had assured him of being preserved to stand before the Roman emperor: and also had informed him, that he had granted his prayers and fervent desires, and for his sake, and as a special favour to him, would save the lives of all those who sailed with him. He, therefore, exhorted them to be cheerful, and hope amidst their perils; for he believed assuredly that God would fulfil his word, as he knew him to be always faithful to his promises. (Marg. Ref. s, t.) The ship, however, would certainly be wrecked, and they would be cast "upon an island," and not on any part of the continent, either of Europe, Asia, or Africa: by which circumstance it would be manifested that he spake by revelation from God. V. 28—32. The mariners, finding by the line, that the depth of the water decreased on every sounding, were afraid of being driven, in the dark, on the rocks or sands, which are found near the shore, and therefore used their utmost endeavours to bring the ship to anchor: waiting with earnest longings for daylight, that they might discover where they were, and what methods could be used for their preservation. (Marg. Ref. c, d. Note, Ps. 130:5,6.) They were fully sensible of the extreme danger to which the ship was exposed; but they hoped to save themselves in the boat, thus leaving the passengers to perish. This selfish purpose, however, they endeavoured to conceal: but the apostle, perceiving what they were about to do, assured the centurion and the soldiers, that they could not be preserved, unless the mariners remained with them; and they paid so much regard to his judgment, as immediately to cut the ropes, by which the boat was fastened, and to give her up to the sea. (Note, 16.) It was the purpose of God to save the lives of the company by means of the mariners, and they must not tempt him, by neglecting the proper method of self-preservation. (Marg. Ref. h, i. Note, Matt. 4:5—7.) Nothing could be more absolute than the promise above given: (24) yet neither the centurion nor the soldiers charged Paul with inconsistency, in what he now said to them. If the end was absolutely decreed, the means of attaining it were so likewise; and the case is the same, in concerns of still higher importance.—'God hath indeed assured me, that none of all our lives shall miscarry in this danger; but that God, who hath ordained our preservation, hath also ordained the means thereof, and therefore hath appointed, that these mariners shall continue in the ship, if we will hope for safety.' Bp. Hall. (Notes, 23:12—22, vv. 16—18. 25:9—11.)

33 And [k]and while the day was coming on, Paul besought them all to take meat, saying, [l]This day is the fourteenth day that ye have tarried and continued fasting, having taken nothing.

34 Wherefore I pray you to take some meat; [m]for this is for your health: [n]for there shall not a hair fall from the head of any of you.

35 And when he had thus spoken, he took bread, [o]and gave thanks to God [p]in presence of them all: and when he had broken it, he began to eat.

36 Then were [q]they all of good cheer, and they also took some meat.

37 And we were in all in the ship [r]two hundred threescore and sixteen [s]souls.

38 And when they had eaten enough, [t]they lightened the ship, and cast out the wheat into the sea.

39 And when it was day, they knew not the land: but they discovered a certain creek with a shore, into the which they were minded, if it were possible, to thrust in the ship.

40 And when they had [*]taken up the anchors, they committed themselves unto the sea, and loosed the rudder-bands, [u]and hoisted up the mainsail to the wind, and made towards shore.

41 And falling into a place where two seas met, [x]they ran the ship aground: and the forepart stuck fast, and remained unmoveable, but the hinder part was [y]broken with the violence of the waves.

42 And [z]the soldiers' counsel was to kill the prisoners, lest any of them should swim out, and escape.

43 But the centurion, [a]willing to save Paul, kept them from their purpose, and commanded that they which could swim, should cast themselves first into the sea, and get to land:

44 And the rest, some on boards, and some on broken pieces of the ship. And so it came to pass, [b]that they escaped all safe to land.

V. 33—38. Till daylight should make way for using proper means of preservation, the apostle showed the whole company, that they might make a most important use of the time, by taking seasonable food. During a fortnight the tremendous violence of the tempest had kept them from making any regular meal, or taken even needful sustenance: so that they were greatly weakened, not only by fatigue and terror, but also by abstinence. This seems the most natural and obvious meaning of the language here used, which was no doubt in some degree hyperbolical: but some think that they were put on short allowance, as the voyage was likely to be much longer than had been expected. St. Paul therefore, whose influence no doubt continually and rapidly increased, urged them to take adequate refreshment: that they might be strengthened for the arduous struggle, which would be necessary, in order to their deliverance from such perilous circumstances; and that their health might not be impaired, seeing that God would certainly preserve their lives. (Marg. Ref. m.) Having, therefore, with all the boldness and confidence arising from a clear conscience and a well-grounded hope in God, "given thanks" to him, in the most public manner, for the food afforded them, and the promise vouchsafed them; he, by his own example, led them to take a regular and cheerful meal: and being fully satisfied with food, and knowing that a few hours must terminate their perils, they cast the remainder of their provisions, as well as of the lading, (for probably the ship was freighted with wheat,) into the sea, as a measure conducive to their preservation. But the mariners discovered a bay of the sea, running up a little way within land, where was a beach, or convenient landing-place; and thither they endeavoured to steer the vessel. Had these things been left to men, unskilled in navigation, the ship must in all probability have been dashed to pieces on the rocks; and the lives of the passengers could not have been preserved without the most extraordinary miraculous interposition.

V. 42—44. The soldiers, perceiving that all must shift for themselves; and supposing, that if any of the prisoners should escape, the survivors of their guards would be called to account for it, advised the immediate execution of the whole company, though yet uncondemned. This could not have been thought of, had not the Roman laws allowed it, or had it not been sometimes done. So that this cruel and unfeeling policy disgraced the jurisprudence of the renowned Romans! Indeed the centurion himself seems not to have been at all shocked by the proposal: and he was induced rather by a personal regard to Paul, than by general principles, either of humanity or justice, to negative the counsel; and this at a time too, when his own life and that of the soldiers were in as much peril as the lives of the prisoners! (Marg. Ref. z, a.)—Thus the apostle, in this respect also, proved a blessing to his companions in suffering: (Note, Gen. 12:1—3, v. 3.) and by the special interposition of Providence, every one of the numerous company got safe to shore.—It is highly reasonable to suppose, that these extraordinary incidents were overruled to the conversion and salvation of many of their souls. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—20. The Lord provides kind friends, and adequate consolations, for his faithful servants, in all their multiplied and varied trials: and even such persons as might previously have been expected to be inimical to them, are sometimes induced to entreat them courteously, and to minister to their refreshment; nor shall these fail of receiving a suitable reward.—Zealous and able ministers cannot, in any situation, be wholly excluded from usefulness: and their gracious God often causes them to pass through troubles, to manifest the power of his consolations in supporting them, and the excellency of their principles and character: in order to excite the attention of the careless, the ignorant, and the prejudiced, to their example and instructions. Their admonitions, however, will generally be at first slighted, even by those worldly

CHAPTER XXVIII.

The whole company, having escaped to the island Melita, are humanely entertained by the inhabitants, 1, 2. A viper fastens on Paul's hand, which he shakes off into the fire, without harm; and the people, who at first supposed he was a murderer, believe that he is a god, 3—6. Publius, the chief man of the island, entertains them all three days, 7. Paul heals the father of Publius, and many other sick persons; and they meet with much respect and kindness, 8—10. Paul and his company depart; and having arrived within some miles of Rome, they are met by brethren from that city, 11—15. Paul is intrusted to a soldier, and dwells in his own lodging, 16. He sends for the chief of the Jews, and shows them the occasion of his coming, 17—22. He proves to a large company, from the Scriptures, that Jesus is the Christ, 23. Some believe, and others do not, 24. He solemnly warns the unbelievers, and shows that the Gentiles would receive his word, 25—29. He continues during two years, to preach the gospel in his own hired house, without interruption, 30, 31.

AND when they were escaped, then they knew that [a]the island was called Melita.

2 And the [b]barbarous people [c]showed us no little kindness: for they kindled a fire, and received us every one, [d]because of the present rain, and because of the cold.

3 And when Paul had gathered a bundle of sticks, and laid them on the fire, there [e]came a viper out of the heat, [f]and fastened on his hand.

4 And when [g]the barbarians saw the venomous [h]beast hang on his hand, they said among themselves, [i]No doubt this man is [k]a murderer, whom, though he hath escaped the sea, yet vengeance suffereth not to live.

5 And he shook off the beast into the fire, and [l]felt no harm.

6 Howbeit, they looked when he should have swollen, or fallen down dead suddenly: but, after they had looked a great while, and saw no harm come to him, they changed their minds, and [m]said that he was a god.

men, who behave in a friendly manner: for while persons of this description give them credit for good meaning, they generally have a very mean opinion of their sagacity. Thus, in hopes of avoiding difficulties, or obtaining conveniences and advantages, the counsels of heavenly wisdom are slighted: and when Providence seems to favour men's carnal projects, they are sanguine in concluding that they have gained their purpose. But disobedience to the counsel and command of God, however made known, will surely lead men into troubles and dangers; and the event will convince them, that their hopes were vain, and their conduct foolish.—What labour do almost all men employ, and what sacrifices do they readily make, in order to preserve their lives, when in imminent danger! Yet how few are willing to labour, or to renounce temporal interest or pleasure, to escape impending and eternal destruction! (P. O. Is. 2:10—22. Notes, Matt. 10:27,28. 16:24—28. P. O. 21—28.)—Groundless hopes are often succeeded by desponding fears; but when sinners renounce all hope of saving themselves, they are prepared to understand the word of God, and to trust in his free mercy through Jesus Christ.

V. 21—44. It is an unspeakable advantage, when the distressed, and those who draw near to death, have some persons at hand, to direct them to the true Foundation of hope, and Source of consolation: and opportunities of this kind should be diligently improved. (Notes, Job 33:19—30. P. O. 14—33.)—It may be proper to remind the afflicted, that they have brought their troubles on themselves, by neglecting good counsel, and by disobeying the commandments of God: but we must also encourage them to hope in his mercy, and in his gracious promises.—"The Lord knoweth them that are his;" and holy angels are ready to minister to them, wherever they go. If we can truly say, "His I am, and him I serve," the whole Scripture says to us, "Fear not;" and he frequently spares the lives, and in numerous instances even saves the souls, of others, for the sake, and in answer to the prayers, of his redeemed and devoted servants. So that they are "a blessing," to every family and neighbourhood in which they reside, and in all places to which they travel.—The comfort of God's precious promises cannot be enjoyed, without a believing dependence on them; and the fulfilment of them must be waited for, in a diligent attendance on the appointed means of grace.—If he have "chosen us in Christ" to eternal salvation; he has also determined, that we shall obtain it in the way of repentance, faith, prayer, watchfulness, and diligent persevering obedience: and it is the most fatal presumption to expect it in any other way. (Notes, and P. O. 2 Thes. 2:13—17.)—Men in general are so selfish, that they are ready to provide for their own preservation, even by such measures as directly conduce to the destruction of those with whom they are most intimately connected! No peril or sufferings can subdue human depravity: so that soldiers and sailors, who experience more hardships, dangers and evident deliverances than other men; and who, it might be thought, would be more careful than others to be always prepared for death and judgment; are too commonly peculiarly regardless of religion and morality!—We must, however, endeavour to accommodate ourselves, as far as we conscientiously can, to those among whom we are placed; and to excite, encourage, and instruct them, by our example and conversation, to trust in the Lord, to thank him for all their comforts, to obey his commands, and to use the proper means of securing their own interest and happiness.—The promises of God cannot be frustrated by the most formidable dangers, nor can his purposes be defeated by any endeavours of his creatures: it is therefore our part to attend on our present duty, and to leave events with him.—All true believers will certainly obtain eternal life and happiness, even as all this company obtained temporal deliverance. Their difficulties, perils, alarms, temptations, and distresses, may be many, and of various kinds. They will sometimes have such hairbreadth escapes, as to remind them of the apostle's words, "the righteous scarcely are saved;" and their preservation and victories will be effected in different ways, beside and beyond their expectation. (Notes, Rom. 8:28—39. 1 Pet. 4:17—19.) They will often, under dark and gloomy dispensations, be required to wait for some token of the Lord's favour, (when they have no light or comfort day after day,) with more earnestness than these mariners wished for the dawn. It will, however, at length, so come to pass, that by one means or another, they will all escape safe to heaven, where mutual congratulations and admiring praises and thanksgivings, will succeed their present trials and distresses, and will not be terminated or interrupted to all eternity.

NOTES.—CHAP. XXVIII. V. 1, 2. The small island of Melita, lies to the south of Sicily. It is now called Malta: for many ages it belonged to the knights of Malta, and recent events have made its name familiar to most readers. Probably, it was peopled by a colony of Phenicians: and the inhabitants were called "barbarians" by the Greeks and Romans, who gave this name to all the rest of the world. The islanders however, were noted for their humanity and kindness to strangers; and their conduct to the shipwrecked company, in their urgent distress, corresponded with that character. As they were all wet, cold, destitute, and almost ready to perish; they kindled a large fire in some place sheltered from the weather, which was cold and rainy, and there entertained and refreshed them, in the best way they could. (Marg. Ref. c, d.)

V. 3—6. The apostle knew how to accommodate himself to any circumstances: and, as the situation of the company required it, he readily assisted in making the fire. But in doing this, he was exposed to a more imminent danger, even than that which he had just escaped. The bite of a viper was supposed to be fatal: and as this viper was irritated by the heat, it might be expected that it would immediately bite him. When therefore the islanders, who had some general notions of a superior power engaged to punish atrocious criminals, saw this fierce and destructive animal fasten on his hand, they looked on him as a dead man: and, perceiving that he was a prisoner, they concluded that he had committed murder, and so had exposed himself to divine vengeance; and that he had escaped from the sea, only that he might be punished in a more exemplary manner. (Marg. Ref. f, h—k. Notes, Luke 13:1—5.) But when, after a considerable time, they saw that no harm followed, they went into the opposite extreme, and concluded that he was one of their deities, thus become visible among them. (Marg. Ref. l, m. Notes, 14: 11—20. Mark 16:17,18. Luke 10:17—20. Rom. 16:17—20, v. 20.) They did not indeed, at this time, know any thing of the true God whose invisible power had thus preserved the life of his servant; but the impression, which these events made on their minds, would conduce to render them afterwards more observant of the apostle's conversation and behaviour.

V. 7—10. It had been providentially ordered, that the ship should be wrecked, near the house and estate of the governor of the island, who courteously and hospitably entertained the whole company three days, till they could be conveniently accommodated elsewhere. Thus Paul became Publius; [o]who received us, and lodged us three days courteously.

8 And it came to pass, that [p]the father of Publius lay sick of a fever, and of a bloody flux: to whom Paul entered in, and [q]prayed, and [r]laid his hands on him [s]and healed him.

9 So when this was done, [t]others also, which had diseases in the island, came, and were healed:

10 Who also [u]honoured us with many honours; and when we departed, they [x]laded us with such things as were necessary. [Practical Observations.]

11 And after three months we departed in [y]a ship of Alexandria, which had wintered in the [z]sle, [a]whose sign was Castor and Pollux.

12 And landing at Syracuse, we tarried there three days.

13 And from thence we fetched a compass, and came to Rhegium: and after one day [b]the south wind blew, and we came the next day to Puteoli:

14 Where [c]we found brethren, [d]and were desired to tarry with them seven days: and so we went toward Rome.

15 And from thence, [e]when the brethren heard of us, they came to meet us as far as Appii forum and The three taverns; whom when Paul saw [f]he thanked God, and took courage.

16 And when we came to [g]Rome, [h]the centurion delivered the prisoners to the [i]captain of the guard: [k]but Paul was suffered to dwell by himself with a soldier that kept him.

17 And it came to pass, that after three days, Paul called the chief of the Jews together: and when they were come together, he said unto them, Men and brethren, [l]though I have committed nothing against the people or customs of our fathers, yet [m]was I delivered prisoner from Jerusalem into the hands of the Romans:

18 Who, [n]when they had examined me, would have let me go, because there was no cause of death in me.

19 But when the Jews spake against it, [o]I was constrained to appeal unto Cesar; [p]not that I had ought to accuse my nation of.

20 For [q]this cause therefore have I called for you, to see you, and to speak with you: because that [r]for the hope of Israel I am bound with [s]this chain.

acquainted with the sickness of the governor's father, who was confined by a most painful and dangerous disease; and when he had (doubtless by his own proposal) prayed for him, and laid his hands on him, he was immediately healed. This must have been a very acceptable return to Publius for his liberal courtesy; and would also excite general attention towards the apostle and his instructions. Accordingly, sick persons from every part of the island were brought to him, and were healed. (Marg. Ref. p—t.) No doubt Paul and his companions zealously improved these opportunities of preaching the gospel; and probably they had considerable success during the three months of their continuance in the island. (11) So that at length they were greatly honoured, as highly favoured by the Lord, and as having abundantly requited the kindness shown them. The whole company were treated with respect, chiefly on the apostle's account; and all their wants were liberally supplied when they departed. (Marg. Ref. u, x.) It is, however, reasonable to conclude from this compendious narrative, that the conduct and discourses of St. Paul and his friends, and all the events of the shipwreck and deliverance, had made a deep impression on the minds of the soldiers, sailors, and passengers; and that they too had behaved so well at Melita, as to conciliate the esteem and favour of the inhabitants.—'No one will ever repent of having entertained a servant of God, however wretched and indigent.' Beza.

V. 11—14. When the winter was over, the centurion and his soldiers, with the prisoners, and their companions, embarked as passengers on board an Alexandrian vessel. Castor and Pollux according to the heathen fables, were twin sons of Jupiter by Leda; and, as a subordinate kind of deities, were supposed to be concerned in the protection of mariners. The images, therefore, of these brothers were placed at the head or the stern of the ship; or, as some think, on both. The apostle had no option, whether he would sail in a ship thus stamped by idolatry: but it is probable, that most ships were, in one way or other, distinguished by some things connected with the prevalent idolatrous sentiments and observances: and as merely a passenger, he would not have regarded it, had he been at liberty.—Syracuse was the capital city of Sicily. Rhegium was a town on the southern extremity of Italy, and Puteoli a sea-port on the south-west side of it. At Puteoli the company landed; and, finding some Christians, the apostle and his friends were desired by them, and allowed by the centurion, to spend a week with them. The centurion's regard to Paul evidently increased during the whole voyage; but it is not said, whether he at length became a Christian, or not. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15. The apostle's approach towards Rome having been known, some of the Christians, who resided in that city, came to meet and welcome him though in bonds. They knew him especially as 'the apostle of the Gentiles;' and the epistle, which he had some time before written to them, had no doubt impressed them with the highest veneration for his character. (Marg. Ref. d. Preface to Romans. Notes, Rom. 1:8—12. 15:22—29.)—Appii forum is computed to have been fifty-one miles from Rome, and The three taverns, thirty-three.—This testimony of respect appears to have been very seasonable: for the circumstances in which the apostle was about to make his first visit to this renowned city, compared with the expectations which he had before expressed, concerning visiting the church there, were suited to damp his hopes of being countenanced, or made useful; but God was pleased to use this promising appearance to inspire him with gratitude and confidence. When the company arrived at Rome the other prisoners were committed to the custody of the captain of the imperial guards, to be lodged in prison: but, through the account sent by Festus, and the report of Julius, Paul was exempted from this hardship, and was allowed to dwell in a lodging apart from other prisoners; and only guarded by a soldier, to whom it is supposed that he was chained. V. 17—20. 'Paul every where remembers that he is an apostle.' Beza.—When the apostle and his friends had arranged their private concerns, and settled themselves in some lodging, as well as they could; he lost no time in sending for the principal persons of his nation to come to him, as he could not go to them. When they were come, he stated to them, that though he had not injured any of his people, or committed any offence against their laws and customs; yet he had been apprehended at Jerusalem, and delivered as a criminal into the hands of the Romans; and at length had been constrained in his own defence to appeal to the emperor. In this statement he carefully avoided all mention of the violent attempt which had been made on his life, and the subsequent plots which had been formed to assassinate him. (Notes, 25:1—12.) He desired to satisfy his countrymen, that he had no ill will to his nation, or resentments against individuals, or intention of accusing them before the Romans. (Marg. Ref. k—o.) It was, however, a fact, that he had not committed any crime, for which he ought to be thus prosecuted; but that he was a prisoner, entirely on account of professing that hope in the Messiah, which was common to the nation; only that he held it with respect to Jesus, who had been crucified and was risen from the dead. (Note, 26:4—8.) His address was the language of candour, caution, and benevolence; and he spake of his chain with great indifference, being willing to wear it for Christ's sake. (*Marg. V. 21, 22. The leading persons of the Jews replied to the apostle, that they had received no account by letters, public or private, concerning him from Judea; nor had they heard any of those who came to Rome, accuse him of any crime: but they desired to hear his sentiments concerning Jesus, seeing "this sect," or heresy, of the Nazarenes, or Christians, was every where spoken against, as destructive of the religion of their ancestors, the source of many disorders, and injurious to mankind. (Marg. Ref. t, u. Notes, 24:1—21. 26:4—8.) This answer shows, that the Jews in Judea despaired of success in following up their accusations at Rome; and that immense pains had been taken to misrepresent the Christians in every part of the world.

V. 23—29. The apostle proceeded in the same manner with the Jews in his lodgings, as he had before been used to take in their synagogues; explaining the nature and privileges of the Redeemer's kingdom and salvation; "testifying" to the facts by which it was introduced; proving from the Scriptures of the prophets, that Jesus was the promised Messiah, and persuading them to believe in him. (Marg. Ref. x, y.) Thus, in the earnestness of his zealous and benevolent soul, he spent the whole day: and though some were won over to the faith, yet it appears that most present rejected his testimony, and even disputed against such as believed. Therefore the apostle parted from them, by observing, that the Holy Spirit had well described their disposition, and awfully denounced their doom by the prophet Isaiah. The passage has already been considered. (Marg. Ref. c—e. Notes, Is. 6:9,10. John 12:37—41.) 'As for the quotation from Isaiah, which he applies to them, I would observe, that it is quoted oftener than any other text from the Old Testament, (that is, six times,) in the New: (here, and Matt. 13:14,15. Mark 4:12. Luke 8:10. John 12:40. Rom. 11:8.) yet in such a variety of expression as plainly proves the apostles did not confine themselves exactly either to the words of the original, or of the Greek version.' Doddridge. St. Paul had observed, during the whole of his ministry, that the nation in general thus closed their eyes and ears to the truth; and he foresaw with great concern, that God was about to give them up to judicial blindness and obduracy for their sins. He would, however, assure them, that the Gentiles, to whom the salvation of God was sent by his ministry, would hear and obey his word. The Jews being thus warned, had, when departing, much reasoning and disputation among themselves in consequence of what they had heard; and probably afterwards some of them embraced the gospel. V. 30, 31. The rulers of the Jews did not follow up their prosecution of Paul, on his appeal to the emperor, who at the present took no notice of the matter: thus the apostle remained two years longer a prisoner at Rome. He was, however, allowed to hire a house, and there openly to exercise his ministry, proclaiming "the kingdom of God," the reign of the Messiah; (Note, Matt. 3:2.) and teaching all things 'that related to the Lord Jesus, showing that he was indeed the Messiah. This he did without meeting with the least interruption, which shows that Nero's persecution was not begun at this time. (Marg. Ref. m, n.) With this remark Luke closed his history: probably the apostle was soon after set at liberty; though it is generally agreed that he afterwards suffered martyrdom at Rome. (Preface to the second Epistle to Timothy.)—Doubtless Luke, Aristarchus, and others who attended on the apostle, or came to him, being themselves at liberty, laboured diligently to make the gospel known in the city and its vicinity, during all the time of the apostle's imprisonment; though the historian, by a modesty almost unprecedented, is wholly silent concerning his own labours and sufferings.—Several of St. Paul's epistles were written during this imprisonment. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. Those who are despised for their rude and uncultivated manners, are often more hospitable, and show more genuine philanthropy, than their more polished neighbours: and heathens, or reputed barbarians, will rise up in judgment against many persons, in this civilized Christian nation, who do not scruple to embezzle the property, or injure the persons of such as are cast upon our shores.—True dignity has no need of affected stateliness; and pride or sloth alone deems that beneath any man, which the present exigency requires for personal or social advantage.—We are always in danger in ourselves, and always safe when under God's protection: and he leads his servants through perils to illustrate their characters, or to show his power in their deliverance.—Even uninformed and barbarous people have a horror of "murder," and an apprehension of divine vengeance on those who commit it: but this may give rise to erroneous judgments; as it is not so generally considered, that the wicked are often reserved for future and more terrible punishment. (Note, 2 Pet. 2:4—9.)—They, whose minds are destitute of due information, are peculiarly apt to pass from one extreme to the other; and to decide on men's characters rather by their success than by their actions.—The Lord raises up friends to his people in every place whither he leads them; he rewards, or enables them to requite their benefactors in a suitable manner; and he renders them a blessing to all who who are connected with them.—The cure of diseases, though valuable, is far more so when united with the means of grace and salvation; and the friends who are raised up to a pious man by his good behaviour and usefulness, will be above all others affectionate and liberal; as far as this is needful and consistent.

V. 11—31. The ordinary transactions of travelling are seldom worth a recital: but the comfort of 'communion with the saints,' and the kindness shown us by our friends, are deserving of a more particular mention.—The respect and love which lively Christians bear to faithful ministers, even though they have never seen them, will induce them sometimes to go far to converse with them: nor should they esteem them the less, on account of their sufferings for the gospel. This conduct is the more incumbent upon them; as the most eminent servants of God are liable to discouragements, and need somewhat to refresh their hopes under long continued trials and temptations.—The Lord moderates the afflictions of his people, as it is best for them; and he can render them easy under their remaining troubles. They should, therefore, be prompt to every service in their power: they also ought to obviate prejudices which hinder their usefulness, as far as they can; and in refuting the charges brought against them, they should be candid, and express good-will towards their enemies.—Should we be called to wear a chain for Christ's sake, we ought not to be ashamed of it, but to glory in it: and though real Christians are every where, and at all times, in this deluded ungodly world, "spoken against" as a precise, troublesome, or fanatical sect; yet we may so behave, that none can speak any personal harm of us.—We should ever be ready to declare our sentiments of Christ and the gospel, to those who desire to hear them: and if the audience did not grow weary, there are times when a zealous minister could expound, and "testify the kingdom of God," and "persuade men concerning Jesus, from morning till evening." Yet at last we must be thankful, if some believe, though far more reject our testimony with pertinacious contempt. But we must show those who disbelieve, what the Holy Spirit has spoken concerning them, and how the Scriptures are fulfilled in them: and warn them not to close their hearts in obstinate unbelief, lest God should judicially leave them to be blinded and hardened to their destruction.—While we mourn on account of despisers, we should rejoice that "the salvation of God is sent" to others, who will receive it; and, if we ourselves be of this number, how thankful should we be to him who has made us to differ!—If under reproach and persecution, the true minister can obtain leave and liberty to preach the gospel, and is favoured with success, he will think his sufferings amply compensated; and be reconciled to his own want of liberty, if he finds that "the word of God hath free course, and is glorified." (Note, 2 Tim. 2:8—13.)

PREFACE TO THE EPISTLES IN GENERAL.

TO ST. PAUL'S EPISTLES,

AND TO THE EPISTLE TO THE ROMANS.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE ROMANS.

We now enter upon the epistolary part of the New Testament, concerning which it may be profitable to make some previous remarks.—The epistles are letters, written either to individuals, to particular churches, or to several churches; or they are catholic epistles, that is, circular letters to the churches in general. It is supposed that they were all written by one or other of the apostles; and, excepting the epistle to the Hebrews, and the epistles ascribed to John, each has the name of an apostle prefixed to it. The apostle Paul's name is affixed to thirteen epistles, and the epistle to the Hebrews has generally been ascribed to him: that of Peter, to two; those of James and Jude, to one each. Now, if they were actually written by the apostles, what shadow of reason can there be in the opinion, which numbers maintain, that they are not to be considered as of equal authority with the gospels? The gospels indeed record the words and actions of Christ; but the human testimony, by which these words and actions were recorded, might even be thought inferior to that of the epistles; for neither Mark nor Luke were apostles: and we have as full proof that the epistles were divinely inspired, as that the gospels were. Various reasons may be assigned, why many truths should be more obscurely delivered, during our Lord's ministry than afterwards, of which he gave several intimations: (Notes, Matt. 10:27,28, v. 27 Luke 12:49—53. John 16:12,13.) and where are we to look for the full and explicit declarations of "the whole counsel of God," but in the writings of those whom the Lord Jesus selected as the depositaries of his truths; to whom he gave "the keys of the kingdom of heaven;" to whom he promised to give the Holy Spirit, "to teach them all things, and lead them into all truth;" and whom "he sent" to make known his gospel, even "as the Father had sent him?" (Notes, Matt. 16:19. John 14:25,26. 20:19—23, vv. 21—23.) If the doctrine of the apostles was the unadulterated and entire truth of God, and altogether of divine authority, as they preached it; why should it not be so when they committed it to writing? and if it was not the unadulterated entire truth, but either redundant or defective; then Christianity was corrupted or mutilated, even from the first. It must also be observed, that it is impossible, that we can know what the apostles preached, except from what they themselves wrote, or what others wrote concerning them: and can we suppose that their own writings are of less authority, than the writings of others on the same subject? If there be any ground for making this distinction between the gospels and the apostolical writings, how is the church "built on the foundation of apostles and prophets?" (Notes, Eph. 2:19—22. Rev. 21:9—21, v. 14.) 'Hence then it follows, that what the apostles have delivered in these epistles, as necessary to be believed or done by Christians, must be as necessary to be believed and practised in order to salvation, as what was personally taught by Christ himself, and is contained in the gospels.' Whitby

Most of the epistles, especially those of St. Paul, were written to those churches, the planting of which is recorded in the Acts of the Apostles: and the history so entirely coincides with them, even in the most minute particulars, and evidently without the least design or aim at coincidence; that the more carefully they are examined, and compared with the history, the more evident will it appear, that both are indisputably genuine. This has been clearly shown by the learned Dr. Paley in his Horæ Paulinæ: and I am decidedly of opinion, that all the genius, sagacity, and care of any number of the most able men who ever lived, would be absolutely insufficient to forge a history, and a number of epistles, so manifestly frank, artless, and often immethodical; and yet to make the one so completely to confirm the other. If ever books had such internal evidence of being genuine, that no reasonable man after a diligent examination of them, could doubt of it, these are the books. But if the epistles be genuine, they must be inspired, and also prove the divine original of Christianity.—Our Lord not only foretold his own death and resurrection, and that before the destruction of Jerusalem, and in that generation, the gospel should be very extensively preached; but he promised to invest his apostles and disciples with miraculous powers, and especially with the gift of tongues, in order to accomplish this object.—'Now I desire to know, whether any thing of this nature was ever undertaken, or laid as the foundation of their credit, by any other authors of any doctrine, religion, sect, or heresy? Whether they ever made their own violent death, and resurrection, the foundation of their veracity? Or promised the like powers and assistances when they were risen, to those who should promote, or should embrace their doctrine? Or whether that, which no man else durst undertake, was not performed by the holy Jesus so effectually, as that his doctrine presently prevailed, and was received throughout the world, in spite of all the opposition of men and devils made against it; and wrought in Christians such a lasting faith, as time, and vice, though most concerned to do it, was never able to deface?' Whitby.—To the fulfilment of these promises, the apostles (especially St. Paul) in these epistles continually refer, as to facts most certainly known by those to whom they wrote; and which none could deny or question. They appeal to the churches, whether they themselves had not exercised these miraculous gifts among them, nay, conferred them on others: they argue with them, from these gifts, as to the truth of their doctrine, when heretics perverted it; they appeal to these gifts, as deciding between them and their opposers; they lay down rules for the behaviour of the churches in respect of them; and they sharply reprove several instances of misconduct in this particular. Can it then be doubted, that supposing the epistles genuine, these miraculous gifts were publicly exercised and conferred, and that all knew them to be so? And if this were the fact, was not the promise of Christ fulfilled? Is not Christianity from God? And can it be supposed that the writers, who exercised and conferred these powers, in so conspicuous a manner, were left to themselves, without the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, in addressing the churches on the most important subjects, and transmitting their doctrine to posterity?

The epistles in general are written in language which shows, that if genuine, they must have been known by the churches to which they were addressed, during the life of the writers: but can it be supposed, that such facts were spoken of as undeniable, during the lives of the writers; and yet, that no one of their opposers, either heretics or persecutors, (not to say their friends,) knowing that no such facts had taken place, should stand forth publicly to deny or confute them?—It is also undeniable, that most of the epistles were known at a very early period, to other churches, as the writings of the apostles whose names they bear. In a short time translations were made of them into other languages, copious quotations were taken from them, and homilies, or expositions, were made on them. The churches, with one consent, acknowledged them as the word of God; and neither heretics, schismatics, nor opposers of the gospel, denied that they were the genuine writings of the apostles, and the standard records of Christianity. But had these epistles, bearing the name of this or the other apostle, been brought forward after their death, when no one, either in the church specially addressed, or in other churches, had ever before heard of them; can it be conceived, but that they would have been rejected as spurious? It is evident the claim would have been absurd, and the imposture manifest. Had they not been known during the life of the writers; at what time, or in what manner, could it have been possible to palm them on the church, and obtain them the credit of apostolical writings?

The epistle to the Hebrews, not bearing the name of St. Paul; that of James, which it seems at that time, as well in latter ages, was supposed irreconcilable with the doctrine of St. Paul; the second epistle of Peter, which probably was written just before his martyrdom, and was not generally known till after his death; and the second and third epistles of John, in which he only styles himself "the elder," were not for some time received by the churches as genuine; but this shows the scrupulous caution of the primitive Christians in this respect; and further inquiry, together with internal evidence, at length obtained the admission of them into the sacred canon. (Prefaces to the epistles to the Hebrews, James, the second of Peter, and the three epistles of John.) Yet very many writings, which, in some places, and for a time, were admitted as apostolical and divine, were afterwards, on fuller investigation, rejected, and most of them have sunk into oblivion.

The epistolary part of the New Testament, while it more fully shows the accomplishment of the ancient prophecies, concerning the establishment of the Messiah's kingdom, than even the historical part has done: contains also many remarkable prophecies, several of which have already received as remarkable an accomplishment; but some still remain to be fulfilled. (Notes, Rom. 11: 2 Thes. 2:1—12. 1 Tim. 4:1—5. 2 Tim. 3:1—5. 2 Pet. 2: 3:) This also constitutes an irrefragable proof, that they were written by inspiration of that God, who sees the end from the beginning.

Finally, it will appear as we proceed, that the writers of these epistles speak of themselves, and of each other, as authoritatively delivering the truth and will of God to mankind. Even the exceptions, (as they are supposed to be,) in a few instances, more undeniably established the general rule: for why should an apostle intimate, that he only gave his own opinion, and not a divine and authoritative injunction, in a particular case; unless conscious, and unless demanding his readers to allow, that in all other cases, he "spake as moved by the Holy Ghost?" But if they advanced these claims, what alternative is there, between admitting them to the full extent, or decidedly rejecting them? That is, What alternative is there, between receiving the apostolical epistles as the infallible word of God, and the standard of truth and duty; and wholly rejecting them as bold impostures? Had no such claims been advanced; it might have been allowed, that they were good men, right upon the whole, yet erroneous in some things: yet on this supposition where shall we find a divine standard of Christianity? But as the case is, either they are infallibly right, their doctrine divine, their writings the standard by which all other doctrines must be tried; or they claim for themselves and each other, what they had no right to claim. I would be very cautious, in venturing on this ground; but I am fully persuaded, and often feel most deeply grieved by the assurance, that far more injury is done to the cause of truth, by a half-hearted allowance, that the epistles (or other parts of Scripture) are genuine, authentic, and instructive, but possibly in some things erroneous; than by all the open attacks of infidels. For these plausible statements leave us no standard of truth and duty; no way of discriminating between true doctrine and heresy; no divinely appointed exhibition of the Christian religion, with which all other exhibitions must be compared, and admitted or rejected as they agree or do not agree with it.

In the Acts of the Apostles, a history, or specimen, is given of the manner in which the apostles and their fellow labourers fulfilled the former part of their risen Lord's commission given to them just before his ascension, "Go ye therefore and teach" (or make disciples of) "all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." In the epistles is more fully shown the particulars, and the way in which they executed the latter part of it; "Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." (Notes, Matt. 28:19,20. Mark 16:14—16.) The former therefore is more exactly suited to the case of missionaries, and persons in similar circumstances: the latter to stationary pastors and their flocks, as far as they are true believers. Both, however, are essentially requisite to an accurate and comprehensive view of Christianity, and of the office and duties of its ministers.

The peculiar doctrines of the gospel are here more explicitly stated and explained, and their practical tendency more argumentatively shown, than in the historical books. The distinguishing truths here laid down, have been kept in view through the whole of the preceding exposition: and it will therefore be unnecessary formally to answer those who have endeavoured to reconcile this part of the Scripture with systems of a contrary nature and tendency. It may, however, be proper to say, that the author has considered with much attention both Dr. Taylor's key to the epistle to the Romans, and the eminent Mr. Locke's comment on several of the epistles: but, deeply convinced that both of these publications "darken counsel by words without knowledge;" he can only on some incidental matters deduce instruction from them. In general, if the various terms used in Scripture concerning Israel as a nation, be in the same, or nearly the same sense to be applied to Christians under the New Testament, where is the type and the antitype? Where is "the true Israel," as distinguished from "Israel after the flesh?" And where are we to learn either the character, privileges, or duties of true believers?

Several of the epistles were written on special occasions, but others were not. These special occasions, however, were of such a nature, as gave the most favourable opportunity for explaining doctrines, enforcing precepts, and giving admonitions and counsels of the greatest importance to the church of Christ in every age. Nor has any thing ever yet been devised, more suited to render "the word of God of no effect," than the notion, that we have little or nothing to do with this and the other part of Scripture, and can conclude nothing general from it, because it was "written on a particular occasion."

We begin with the epistles of the apostle Paul, who wrote as well as laboured, more abundantly than all his brethren. Fourteen of his epistles are reserved for our instruction. In all his writings, we perceive evident proofs of a sound judgment, a talent for close reasoning, a lively imagination, and fervent affections: sometimes, yet not so often by far as many have supposed, he induces a measure of obscurity by long parentheses. All his abilities and endowments, however, were directed and superintended by the Spirit of inspiration.

The epistle to the Romans is placed first, though some others were written before it: but it was addressed to the Christians, who resided in the capital city of that great empire, which then lorded it over the whole known world; and the epistle itself is one of the longest, and most comprehensive, of all that were written by the apostle. It is not known when, or by whom, the gospel was first preached at Rome; but it is conjectured, that it was carried thither by some of those Jews who were converted at the day of Pentecost. (Acts 2:10.) Paul, however, had not yet visited that city; but, as 'the apostle of the Gentiles,' he deemed it proper to use this method of establishing the believers in the faith; and of giving them such a comprehensive view of the Christian religion as might put them upon their guard against false teachers of various descriptions.—This epistle is the only part of the Scripture in which divine truth is delivered in a systematical method: and it is a proper model for any one, who intends to compile a body of divinity. After the introduction, the apostle opens his subject, (as it is reasonable to begin systematical treatises,) by showing man's relations and obligations to God his Creator, and his apostacy from his worship and service: he proceeds to prove the universal sinfulness of both Gentiles and Jews, and the impossibility of any man's justifying himself before God, by his own obedience. Having brought the whole world in guilty, deserving of wrath, and shut up under sin and condemnation; he proceeds to state the method of salvation by the mercy of God, through the redemption of his Son, and the way of justification by faith in his blood, and the imputation of his righteousness, as "the righteousness of God, which is unto and upon all that believe." This he proves, illustrates, and exemplifies very fully: he next proceeds to show that this way of justification is closely connected with sanctification, and evangelical obedience: he then states the believer's experience and conflicts; and displays his character, hopes, and privileges: and at length he leads our reflections back to the source of these blessings, in the eternal election, and sovereign love and mercy of God. Having thus stated and proved doctrines, and answered objections to them, and discussed several questions respecting the calling of the Gentiles and the rejection of the Jews, he applies the whole discourse by a variety of practical exhortations, precepts, and instructions, enforced by evangelical motives. And, having touched upon some particulars, suited to the circumstances of those times, he concludes with affectionate salutations, cautions, and prayers; and with ascribing glory to God our Saviour.

CHAPTER I.

The apostle shows his apostolical authority, and the great subject of his ministry, 1—5. He salutes the Christians at Rome, 6, 7; thanking God on their account, and praying for them; especially that he might come and preach among them, 8—15. The gospel is the power of God to salvation, and shows the only way of justification, 16, 17. All men of every nation are exposed to the wrath of God, for acting in opposition to the light afforded them, 18—23. A just but unwilling description of the Gentile world, as given up, by the just displeasure of God, to the grossest idolatries, the most degrading licentiousness, and the most atrocious iniquities, 24—32.

NOTES.—CHAP. I. V. 1—4. According to the custom of those times, the apostle began this epistle, by prefixing his name and distinguishing title. (Notes, Acts 15:22—29, v. 23. 23:25—30, v. 26.) The Christians at Rome would receive this letter from Paul, who was also called Saul, and had been a persecutor of the church; but who now regarded it as his honour and happiness, to be "the servant of Jesus Christ, and his called apostle;" having been "separated," and appointed, by the choice and effectual calling of God, to preach his gospel to the world, and to spend his subsequent life in promoting it. (Marg. Ref. a—e. Notes, Gal. 1:15—24.) This doctrine was no new discovery or invention, but the fulfilment of the promises made in the sacred Scriptures by the prophets; and it respected the Son of God, even Jesus the Saviour, the promised Messiah, the Prophet, Priest, and King of the church, whom all believers acknowledged and obeyed as their Lord. He was descended from David, according to the flesh, or in his human nature: but he had also been declared, or determined, to be the Son of God by that divine power, which raised him from the dead. (Marg. Ref. d—k.)—The expression, "according to the Spirit of holiness," has been generally interpreted to signify, "according to his divine nature;" but it is not used in that sense in any other place, nor does it obviously convey that idea. Others therefore explain it of the conception of Jesus by the Holy Spirit, on which account he was called "the Son of God:" but this does nothing more than state, what he was "according to the flesh," or in his human nature; whereas the apostle clearly intended to show his divine nature, as the "only begotten Son of the Father;" and the antithesis as well as the context, evidently requires this. Our Lord indeed wrought all his miracles by the Spirit of God, which was "given to him without measure:" but the apostle plainly speaks of "the Spirit of holiness," in immediate connexion with the demonstration, that Jesus was the Son of God, which arose from his resurrection from the dead. Now, the pouring out of the Holy Spirit on the witnesses of his resurrection, and all the stupendous effects which followed, both in respect of them, and of those on whom they laid their hand, were a divine attestation to their testimony: and thus Jesus, who was crucified for affirming that he was "the Son of God," was "declared," or "determined to be the Son of God, with power by his resurrection," according to the demonstration of that event, arising from the divers powers, signs, and miracles, which the Spirit of God enabled the apostles and primitive Christians to perform. (Marg. Ref. l, m. Note, Heb. 2:1—4, v. 4.) It may also be observed, that the Holy Spirit had foretold, by the prophets, that the Messiah would be the Son of God, as well as the Son of David; and also that he would be put to death, and rise again, and enter into his glory. When, therefore, the Lord Jesus, having been put to death as a deceiver and blasphemer, arose from the dead, "ascended on high, ... and gave gifts to men;" especially by pouring out the Holy Spirit on his apostles and disciples, according to the predictions of holy men from the beginning, "who spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost;" he, in both respects, was "declared to be the Son of God with power, by his resurrection from the dead, according to the Spirit of holiness." (Notes, Acts 2:22—36. Eph. 4:7—13.)

V. 5—7. From this glorious Saviour, Paul declared that he had received mercy and grace, as well as an appointment to the apostolical office; that he might be employed as his minister in bringing sinners of all nations to "the obedience of faith," by accepting of the Redeemer's mercy, and becoming the willing and devoted subjects of his kingdom, for the honour of his name in their salvation, worship, and service. (Marg. Ref. n—r. Notes, 12:3—5. 15:14—21. 1 Cor. 15:3 —11, vv. 8—10. 1 Tim. 1:12—14. 2 Tim. 1:11,12.) Among this happy and favoured company were the persons to whom he sent this epistle; for they too had been "called" by the gospel, to become disciples of Jesus, to bear his name, and to trust and serve him. As Paul was 'the apostle of the Gentiles,' he considered himself peculiarly interested in their welfare, though they had not been converted by his ministry; he had therefore written this epistle to them: and he addressed it, not to the citizens of Rome in general, nor to the church of Rome, or at Rome, but to all those who had been "called to be saints," or holy, separate, and sanctified persons, partakers of divine grace, and devoted to the service of God; and who were thus evidenced to be beloved by him, partakers of his mercy and plenteous redemption, renewed in a measure to his holy image in which he delights, and constituted heirs of his everlasting kingdom. (Marg. Ref. s—y.) These the apostle saluted by wishing them "grace and peace:" grace to pardon and justify them, and to sanctify their souls, and peace to comfort their hearts and consciences. Of these blessings, the sum of all happiness, he ardently desired that every professed Christian at Rome might participate: and that they all might continually have an accession made to that measure, which they had already obtained; as springing from the free mercy of God, the reconciled Father of all believers, and coming to them, through the Person, merits, and mediation of the Lord Jesus Christ.

This is the customary apostolical salutation; and it is most undeniably a prayer, or act of worship, in which Christ is addressed in union with God the Father. (Marg. Ref. z—c. Notes, 14:13—18, v. 17. John 14:27,28. 1 Cor. 1:3. Eph. 1: 1,2. Phil. 2:5—8.)

V. 8—12. The apostle next assured "the saints at Rome," that, though personally a stranger to them, he heartily "thanked his God, through Jesus Christ," for the mercy which he had shown to them all; as their faith in Christ, and its happy effect upon their conduct, were spoken of in every part of the world. (Marg. Ref. d—g. Notes, Phil. 1:3—6. 1 Thes. 1:1—8.) Wherever he went, he heard the commendation of the believers at Rome; and their good conduct was the more noticed by reason of the renown of that city, and the temptations with which they were surrounded. He could therefore confirm what he was about to say, by solemnly calling to witness that God, whom he worshipped and served; not only with constant and persevering diligence, but with inward fervency, zeal, and devotion; according to the display of his glory made in the gospel, and by promoting that doctrine which respects his Son, as the great Author and Subject of it. This glorious God was witness, that he prayed for them all, on every occasion, without intermission, or neglect; and he especially besought the Lord, that he would enable him to go among them, if after so long a time, and so many disappointments, he might at length be favoured with a prosperous journey to come unto them, by the will and appointment of God. (Marg. Ref. i—m. Notes and P. O. Jam. 4:13—17.)—The apostle's language is, for substance, a most solemn oath or appeal to the heart-searching God for the truth of what he said. (Marg. Ref. h. Note, Matt. 5:33—37.) For he ardently desired to see and converse with them, that he might impart to them some of those spiritual gifts, which were generally conferred by imposition of the apostles' hands, in order to their establishment in the faith. (Note, Acts 8:14—17.) And this he desired, in order that he might share the comfort bestowed on them, and rejoice in ministering to their joy; as well as in conferring with them, concerning the nature, object, and effects of that faith, which was held both by them and him. (Marg. Ref. q—u.)—St. Paul doubtless meant to remind the Romans of his apostolical character and authority, as sanctioning his doctrine, by which he intended to guard them especially against the Judaizing teachers: yet he aimed to do this, in the most unassuming and affectionate manner possible; that he might give no disgust to any person, or furnish false teachers with any handle against him.—Som think that the Christians at Rome had received supernatural gifts. (12:6.) Yet it does not appear that any apostle had been there: Paul, however, expected that these gifts would be more abundantly imparted, when he should go among them; and that they would be thus fortified against such as attempted to pervert them, as well as against the fear of persecution.—It has been seen how his prayers for "a prosperous journey" to Rome were answered by his being sent thither as a prisoner! V. 13—15. The apostle next showed, that he had repeatedly purposed to come to Rome; but that he had been hindered hitherto, by his multiplied engagements, and by the opposition made to his ministry: because he was exceedingly desirous to have some fruit among the Romans, as well as among the other Gentiles: for, as he had been converted in a most extraordinary manner, and intrusted with a dispensation of the gospel; he thought himself bound to do every thing which he possibly could, to promote the salvation of men in general, especially among the Gentiles. (Marg. Ref. x—b.) This was a debt, which he owed both to the civilized Greeks or Romans, and to the rude barbarians; and indeed to the learned and unlearned of every nation, from the wise philosopher to the untutored labourer. (Marg. Ref. c—f.) With this view of his obligation, he was ready, according to his ability and opportunity, to preach the gospel at Rome also: though in that haughty and magnificent capital, he might encounter more contempt and opposition, than in other places; and though his address might be less suitable to the fastidious taste of its refined inhabitants. V. 16. However the noble, the learned, or the proud, might despise the doctrines of the gospel; and especially that of salvation by faith in the righteousness, atonement and intercession of a Jew, who had been crucified as a deceiver by his own countrymen; the apostle was in no wise "ashamed of" it, but was ready to glory in his belief of it before all men: he knew indeed, that the power of God attended, and was displayed by that doctrine, for the salvation of every believer, not only from merited condemnation, but also from the power of his corrupt passions and habits, from the bondage of Satan, from the love of the world and the fear of men, and from all sin and misery: so that, while Jewish rabbies, and Pagan philosophers, had tried in vain to reform men's lives; the despised gospel of Christ, wherever it had been preached, had been rendered extensively successful for that purpose.

(Marg. Ref. i—l.) This had first been evidenced among the Jews, in the conversion and holy lives of multitudes, who had before borne very bad characters: and afterwards it had produced similar effects among the Gentiles, vast numbers of whom had been turned from their immoralities and idolatries, to the holy worship and service of the true God. (Marg. Ref. n. Notes, John 12:27—33, v. 32. 1 Cor. 1:20—24. 2 Cor. 4:7. 10:1—6, vv. 4,5.)—"It is the power of God unto salvation." 'To whom? To all that believe. Now it is plain, that it is not merely the power of God manifested in outward miracles, that is there spoken of; for miracles were wrought upon and in the presence both of them that believed not, and them that did believe. The power of God, there spoken of, is a power felt only by them that believe: so that whatever the enemies of the free grace of God may... suggest; it cannot be meant of those extraordinary manifestations of power in healing men's bodies, &c. but of that inward teaching and drawing of the Father, of which the prophets foretold, that it would be bestowed in a large manner in gospel times.' Dr. Maclaurin. (Notes, John 6:41—46, vv. 44,45,60—65, v. 65.)

V. 17. In the gospel, God had revealed, not only the righteousness of his perfect character and government, and the righteousness required by his holy law, but that also which he had appointed, provided, and introduced, for the justification of sinners before him. This might be called "the righteousness of God," for other reasons; but especially, because it consisted of the perfect obedience unto death of that glorious person, who is "God manifested in the flesh." 'This phrase, in St. Paul's style, doth always signify the righteousness of faith in Christ Jesus dying, or shedding his blood for us....This righteousness consists not in our sanctification, but in our justification, or absolution from our sins past, through faith in the blood of Christ, shed for the remission of sins.' Whitby.—'Therein is the righteousness, which is of the free grace of God, through Jesus Christ, revealed to be wholly of faith.' Locke. (Marg. Ref. o.)—The texts referred to, if duly considered, will prepare the reader to expect something still more appropriate, in this most remarkable expression; and a far higher privilege to believers, than these concessions, which are of no small importance, point out to us. (Notes, 3:21—26. 2 Cor. 5:18—21, v. 21. Phil. 3. 8—11, v. 9. 2 Pet. 1:1,2.) This "righteousness of God is revealed from faith to faith;" it is altogether of faith, from first to last, and without any respect to other distinctions, and the faith which receives it, is capable of continual augmentation or rather it is revealed from the faithfulness of God in his word, to the faith of the believer: as by faith alone is the sure testimony and faithful promise of God received and appropriated: according to the doctrine of the prophet, that the truly just or righteous man "shall live," or be accepted and saved, "by faith," and not by works: or "the just by faith shall live:" no other justice, or righteousness, except that by faith, can bring the possessor to eternal life. (Marg Ref. p, q. Notes, Hab. 2:4. Gal. 3:10—14, v. 11. Heb. 10:35—39.)

V. 18—20. 'In vain does the evangelical doctrine exhort men to seek righteousness and salvation in Christ alone, apprehended by faith; unless all men be previously convicted as guilty of unrighteousness; which the apostle now begins to prove, concluding at the twentieth verse of the third chapter.' Beza.—The apostle here opens his main subject; and begins to show, that all men deeply need the salvation of the gospel, because none can obtain the favour of God, or escape his wrath, by their own works. The ignorant and deluded indeed might imagine that their supposed virtues would atone for their vices; but in fact "the wrath of God has been revealed from heaven," against every kind and degree of "ungodliness and unrighteousness of men:" not only against vice and immorality, in the conduct of men towards each other; but every failure of that reverence, love, gratitude, and honour, which are due unto God: even of "all those who hold the truth in unrighteousness." This revelation had been especially made by the holy law of God, and the Old Testament dispensation; and had now been more generally published and fully explained by the gospel. (Marg. Ref. r—t.) And though some extenuation might be admitted, in respect of those who had not been favoured with "the oracles of God;" yet all men were found guilty, and exposed to this "revealed wrath," for "holding the truth in unrighteousness," or acting in opposition to their knowledge, and the conviction of their own consciences. All were acquainted with many leading truths, concerning moral duties; but their depravity imprisoned those truths, and so restrained them from duly influencing their conduct. All might have known far more than they did, had they not hated the light through love of sin. Indeed to this day, no man of any sect or nation perfectly lives up to his own principles: all, at some times and in some things, do what they know to be wrong, and omit what they know to be their duty. So that the plea of ignorance cannot be admitted, in its full latitude, in favour of any but idiots; for all rebel against that light, not only which they might have obtained, but which they actually possess. (Marg. Ref. u.)—This general principle the apostle proceeded to illustrate, by the state of the Gentile world. The Pagans had not the light of revelation: but the works of creation preached to them; (Marg. Ref. x, y. Notes, Ps. 19:1—6.) and that "which might be known of God," was made manifest even among them; for God had showed it to them from age to age, ever since the world was created. The wonderful formation of their own bodies and souls, as well as the various objects all around them, proclaimed these truths: so that, being endued with rational powers, they could not have failed of knowing the true God, as their Creator, Benefactor, and Governor, and in respect of many of his attributes, had it not been for the apostacy and carnal enmity of their hearts. Indeed God himself "dwelleth in light inaccessible," and his essential glory must be invisible to mortal eye: yet "his invisible power and Godhead" are so clearly reflected from the works which he has made, and visible in them, that his eternal and underived existence, his omnipotence, and other perfections, must be known from the beauty, excellency, variety, and immensity of his creatures, by all intelligent beings; except as their minds are debased and alienated from him by sin. (Marg. Ref. z—b.) Thus, even idolaters and Gentiles are left without excuse; and their ungodliness and unrighteousness are proved to be the effect of their depraved dispositions, rather than of their want of information, or the means of obtaining it. They all might have known more of God than they did, had they been properly disposed: and many of those who had discovered the vanity of the popular idolatries, and acquired some just notions of God and his worship, continued to act in opposition to their knowledge, from worldly motives. Thus "they imprisoned the truth in unrighteousness:" it is in vain to attempt an excuse for them; and the divine verdict, brought in against them, accords with the plainest dictates of justice and equity. —Revealed. (18) 'The words of St. Paul to the Athenians give light to these here to the Romans. Acts 17:22—31.' Locke.—Ungodliness denotes the idolatry, irreligion, profaneness, and ingratitude to God, of mankind in general; and unrighteousness, their injustice, oppression, cruelty, and base conduct towards each other: the former may refer to the first table of the law; the latter to the second: yet, by both they rebelled against God and deserved his wrath.—Being understood, &c. (20) 'Or, "If they be minded they are seen." The invisible things of God lie within the reach and discovery of man's reason and understandings; but yet they must exercise their faculties and employ their minds about them.' Locke. (Notes, 28—32. Prov. 17:16.)

V. 21—23. 'Men of their own accord rushed into idolatry, to understand and condemn which they might have had light enough within, if they had not voluntarily extinguished it; partly by negligence, and partly by wickedness; on which account the apostle says, that "they detained the truth in unrighteousness."' Beza. Idolatry was first introduced, and became general and perpetual in the world, through man's depraved aversion to the holy character, worship, and service of the true God. The posterity of Noah had some knowledge of JEHOVAH; but they revolted from his service, and refused "to glorify him as God," by their adoration, love and obedience: neither were they thankful for the bounties of Providence, but abused them by intemperance, and forgot the Giver. (Marg. Ref. e, f.) Thus impiety and iniquity made way for idolatry, which was become almost universal when God called Abraham. From that time, the same causes produced the same effects, in every part of the world. Indeed, some of the philosophers, of Greece and Rome, had acquired some indistinct knowledge of the Being and perfections of the One supreme God; and they speculated on subjects of this kind with a measure of acuteness and plausibility: yet they "glorified him not as God," either by their avowed adoration, or in the conduct of their lives; nor were they thankful for his goodness to them. On the contrary, they sanctioned, by a hypocritical conformity, the stupid idolatries of their countrymen: and, proud of their superior discernment, they amused themselves with vain fancies, and reasonings, concerning matters too high and abstruse for them. Thus they were bewildered in inextricable mazes, and most of them took refuge in skepticism or atheism, in some of its varied forms. Their minds, being destitute of practical wisdom and understanding, became more and more darkened with error and delusion: and, while they professed themselves to be sages, wise men, and philosophers, they were infatuated, or turned into mere fools, or idiots, in the great concerns of God and religion. (Marg. Ref. g—i. Notes, Gen. 6:5. 8: 20—22, v. 21.) So that most of them relapsed into gross idolatry; and men in general concurred in exchanging the glorious Object of all worship for inanimate idols. They at first commonly "changed the glory of the incorruptible God into the image" of a mortal man, which they foolishly supposed to be a proper resemblance of him: at length they made images of their deities, like birds, beasts, fishes, serpents, and insects; and thus actually fell down to worship the meanest and most noxious of the creatures. It is well known that many of the ancients, especially the learned Egyptians, worshipped dogs, snakes, reptiles, nay, even vegetables! Thus mankind, having retained from original tradition, or having acquired by the exercise of reason, some general notions of a Deity; invented numerous species of idolatry, and universally forsook the worship of the true God, in all places where revelation was not actually vouchsafed.—Indeed the fact is undeniably the same even to this day; and if any nations seem to be sunk into so entire a stupidity, as to have no notions of a God remaining among them, this still more clearly proves, not man's want of rational powers, but his carnal enmity to God and religion, through which he becomes more and more the besotted and blinded slave of Satan. (Marg. Ref. k, l. Notes, Ex. 20:3. 32:1—6. Ps. 106:19—23. Is. 44: 9—20. Jer. 10:1—15. Acts 17:22—31.) Cicero's books, 'On the nature of the gods,' contain many very striking illustrations of the apostle's meaning.

26 For this cause God [x]gave them up unto [y]vile affections. For even their women did change the natural use into that which is against nature:

27 And likewise also the men, leaving the natural use of the woman, burned in their lust one toward another; men with men working that which is unseemly, and receiving in themselves [z]that recompense of their error which was meet.

28 And even [a]as they did not like to [†]retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over [b]to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are [c]not convenient:

noured God by wilful apostacy and idolatry; he left them, under the influence of Satan, to debase themselves by the most unnatural and abominable lewdness. This did not so much result from the prevalence of animal inclinations, (for the very brutes are kept from excessive and unnatural practices,) as from "the lusts of their own hearts," which madly sought satisfaction in sensuality, when they had lost the favour of God and happiness in him. Thus they disgraced their bodies, by using them to perpetrate with each other the most detestable pollutions: even those bodies, which the Creator had formed with most exquisite contrivance and good-will; as might best render them accommodated to the purposes of their own comfort and usefulness to one another, and to be the instruments of the soul in his worship and service. (Marg. Ref. m—p.) This was permitted judicially; because they had exchanged "the truth of God," which had been made known to them, respecting his nature, perfections, and worship, for the basest falsehoods and delusions of the devil, and the sophistical conclusions of their own vain reasonings: and, in consequence, they had rendered divine honour to creatures, in preference to the infinite Creator, who is in himself "most blessed for evermore;" whom all rational creatures ought to adore and bless; and whose praises are celebrated by all the inhabitants of heaven; while saints on earth repeat a cordial Amen to them. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. q—u.)—The idolaters first joined creatures with God in their worship, or adored them as mediators; then they used images to represent the invisible Object of their adoration; and at length the meanest of the creatures engrossed the whole of it. The Lord, therefore, being provoked to jealousy by this base apostacy and ingratitude, gave them up to the vilest passions and inclinations; so that they were left to practise such unnatural lusts as are not fit to be mentioned, except as a stigma on human nature, and to enhance the grace of our redemption. And this was a judgment "meet" for such a crime: as they had so dishonoured God, through their pride and carnal enmity, it was proper for them to be left to dishonour themselves, and to expose their own shame; that the consequences of their apostacy, and the blindness of their boasted reason, as well as the filthiness of their hearts, might be known to the whole intelligent creation. (Marg. Ref. x—z.)—Those unnatural crimes and vile affections, which are most scandalous at present, and carefully concealed, or most severely punished, were openly avowed among the Greeks and Romans, even in their politest ages; and their most elegant and celebrated poets have defiled their compositions by the mention of such detestable amours, without any expressions of abhorrence, or even of disapprobation; nay, often in a way, which sanctions them, and almost wins the unwary reader to palliate, or even approve them!

V. 28—32. Men, in all ages and nations, had shown a disposition and decided purpose to discard from their minds the knowledge of the true God. Having no delight in him, they did not endeavour "to retain him in their knowledge."—Not approving the knowledge of JEHOVAH, men in every age and nation had been and were prompt to run into idolatry. This was an evident fact all over the Gentile world.—The glorious perfections, spiritual worship, and holy service of God, by no means suited the proud, sensual, carnal heart of fallen men: so that, as with one consent, they preferred the basest idols to him, because more congenial to their dispositions, and consistent with their favourite pursuits. (Marg. Ref. a.) In righteous judgment God gave them up to "a reprobate mind," (rejecting God, and rejected by him,) that they should foolishly and perversely prefer the most shameful and pernicious practices, to those which are decent, honourable, and becoming rational creatures. Thus they were left to commit those crimes, which were utterly inconsistent with reason, nature, and their own and each other's welfare. (Marg. Ref. b, c.) Nay, they proceeded to such lengths in wickedness, that their whole hearts and lives were filled with every kind of fraud, oppression, extortion, and iniquity: they practised all fornication, incest, and adultery without remorse: they delighted in mischief for its own sake: they rapaciously amassed wealth by every means in their power, however mean, iniquitous, and oppressive: they revenged every injury with desperate, implacable, and pertinacious malice: they envied all, who were more honoured or prospered than themselves: they were prompt to commit murder, or engage in any kind of bitter contests, and to every species of deceit and malignity, or habitual mischievousness, as delighting in the misery of others. Secret calumnies and slanders were employed to ruin the characters of their neighbours or rivals: they were "haters of God," and of his authority, law justice, service, and providence, and despiteful to his worshippers, and to each other. They were proud of their genius, sagacity, learning, possessions, and exploits; they idolized themselves, in boasting of their virtues or performances, and in wholly seeking their own glory in the most ostentatious manner. They invented new species of cruelty, treachery, luxury, impiety, idolatry, sensual gratification, and magnificence. They cast off all regard to parental authority, and despised, injured, or even murdered their aged parents, as the emperor Nero did his mother Agrippina. They acted in many things, as if they had been destitute of common sense, by the indulgence of their headstrong passions: they violated without scruple the most solemn treaties, covenants, and oaths: they sinned away natural affection, and even exposed their new-born infants, leaving them to perish without remorse or censure, that they might not have the trouble or expense of bringing them up; and in many places they put to death their parents, when they became helpless and burdensome. They were implacable in their resentments, and unmerciful in their dispositions: so that, besides the cruel carnage of their ambitious wars, the indiscriminate slaughter which often attended the taking of cities, and the frequent murder of their vanquished enemies; their public diversions consisted in beholding gladiators fighting together, till hundreds were sometimes massacred before their eyes; or in seeing slaves and criminals fighting with wild beasts, and often devoured by them. Nor did the principal persons, whether men, or women, of the highest rank, and most cultivated manners in other respects, absent themselves from these horrid spectacles! (Marg. Ref. d—m.) Nay, even those among them, who were most fully convinced that these things were criminal, and deserving of condemnation and death according to "the judgment of God," not only continued to practise them, but also delighted in, honoured, caressed, flattered, preferred, or even deified, such persons, as were most notoriously addicted to them. (Marg. Ref. n, o. Note, 2 Tim. 3:1—5.)—The history of the Greeks and Romans, especially of the latter, about the time when the apostle wrote, abundantly illustrates this horrid description of their general character, from which even their philosophers and moralists were by no means excepted. And not only their indignant, but their easy good tempered satirists, and their other poets and orators, drew such pictures of the public morals, as abundantly show that the apostle has not used any hyperbole, in this animated and awful description.—It might easily be shown, that the morals of idolatrous nations, if judged according to the immutable standard of the divine law, are at this day not at all better than the description here given of the Gentile world.—Have pleasure, &c. (32) 'This, say the Greek commentators, is much worse than the bare doing of them: for a man may do them by the power of temptation; and by consideration become sensible of his folly, and repent of it: but when he is arrived at that height of wickedness, that he not only approves, but delights in seeing the like things done by others, he demonstrates such a strong affection to them as is incurable.' Whitby.—The apostle, however, is showing what need the Gentiles, and all men, had of the grace of the gospel; and not that they were incurable by it: and in fact multitudes who once had answered this description, afterwards embraced Christianity, and became "a peculiar people zealous of good works."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. "A servant of Jesus Christ" is the highest style of man: and that of a minister or an apostle, only specifies the particular service in which he is employed; but the Christian slave is "a servant of Christ," as truly as the apostle.—All those who are thus distinguished have been "called" out of a state of darkness and alienation from God, and "separated" from their sinful connexions, by divine grace; and thus taught to believe, love, adorn, and promote the gospel of God. This gospel, though often treated as a new doctrine, and is new to those who have never before heard or read it, has comprised the whole hope of sinful man from the fall of Adam; and was promised by the prophets many ages before it was published by the apostles of Jesus Christ. He is the great Subject of the gospel, being "the Son of David," and "the Son of God," according to the testimony of the Spirit of holiness by the prophets, and the demonstration of his resurrection from the dead by the power of God, attested by the same Spirit. "From his fulness have all" his servants "received," he gives grace to the sinner, and qualifies the believer, or the minister, for the work allotted to him: but in vain do any claim authority in the church, as successors to the apostles, when their lives evince that they have not received regenerating grace; and when instead of bringing others to "the obedience of faith," they themselves are evidently disobedient and unbelieving.—The end of the gospel ministry is to bring sinners, of all nations, to obey the commands of God, by believing in his Son, and submitting to his authority; that his name may be glorified in their salvation, and that they may become a peculiar people to show forth his praises. Happy they, who are thus "the called of Jesus Christ to be his saints," beloved of God and devoted to him! They should often recollect their character and privileges, that they may be excited to act consistently; and they should cordially desire and pray for an increase of "grace and peace" to all their brethren in every place. Without grace there can be no substantial peace. in proportion as grace is communicated, peace may be expected; and when grace shall ripen into perfect holiness, peace will become complete fruition. These then are the great blessings, which we should seek for ourselves, our children, our friends, and all around us, in preference to all earthly possessions or prosperity: and they must be sought from the mercy of God our Father, by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and by reliance on his merits and mediation.

V. 8—15. Zealous Christians are always ready to thank God, in behalf of all others who partake of the same invaluable blessings, in which they themselves rejoice: and we should cultivate this pious and benevolent disposition, that we may present our grateful tribute to the Lord, not only for our friends, or such as have been converted by our means; but for strangers also, and for all concerning whom we hear a good report. Indeed if we "serve God with our spirit in the gospel of his Son," we shall be sure to approve our hearts before him, as deeply concerned for the peace and prosperity of his church: and we should also without ceasing, in our daily prayers, make mention of our fellow-Christians, and the success of the gospel all over the world. Yet alas! most of us must own with shame, that we are not so earnest or particular in this respect, even in our narrow circles, as Paul was, in respect of his most extensive connexions, and with all his urgent and multiplied engagements. But we should endeavour to imitate him, even as he imitated Christ: and we ought to long for opportunities of usefulness, as worldly men do for a prosperous trade, or occasions of distinguishing themselves and acquiring celebrity: and count that the most successful journey or undertaking, in which most good has been done or attempted; though it have exposed us to hardship, loss, or peril. We should earnestly request the Lord, that by his will such opportunities may frequently return; though we know not in what manner our prayers may be answered: we should readily impart to others, what God has intrusted to us; whether to supply their temporal wants, or to promote their spiritual comfort and establishment: we ought to rejoice in making others joyful; and should peculiarly take pleasure in communing with those, who believe, hope for, and experience the same things as we do. But purposes, resulting even from this happy and excellent state of mind, may often be retarded and disappointed: nor ought we to be discouraged or desist on this account. We should still desire and expect the opportunity of "bringing forth fruit," though we have been "hindered hitherto:" and, while we ought to be thankful for the least usefulness, we should not say of any measure, Let this suffice us, as long as we have health and strength for labour, and so much yet remains to be done, before "all nations" are brought "to the obedience of faith." Being redeemed by the blood, and converted by the grace, of the Lord Jesus, we are altogether his: and for his sake, we are debtors to all men, to do them all the good we can; to whatever nation they belong, or of whatever complexion, rank, capacity, or education they are. Nor ought we to deem such services any great thing; but merely our bounden duty, our debt of devoted obedience to God, of gratitude to Christ, and of love to our neighbours and our brethren.

V. 16—21. We ought not for a moment to allow of that absurd and hateful shame, which the enmity and contempt of the wicked against the gospel often excite in our minds. On the contrary, we should glory in the doctrine of the cross; and be ready to profess or preach it, in any place, or before any description of men, according to our ability and our call in Providence; as knowing, that it is "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth," and that no sinner can be saved in any other way. It is indeed evident to this day, that learned speculations, and supposed rational schemes, or the elegances of admired orators, are not attended in general with that power, which converts sinners from impiety and immorality to the love and service of God: but this effect is produced in some good measure, wherever the despised gospel is preached, even though it be in a homely manner, and by persons of inferior abilities, erudition, and elocution. For by the gospel is "the righteousness of God revealed;" his way of justification and sanctification is opened; and sinners are taught to trust in him, and to come before him, by faith in his mercy, through the righteousness, atonement, and intercession of his beloved Son. He will therefore honour this doctrine, because it honours his perfections, law, and government, and because it is his own appointment: and they who devise other schemes may put forth their own power to make them successful, if they can; but God will not own or countenance them.—The gospel is "worthy of universal acceptation;" "for the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men:" and all have been in some degree at least, ungodly and unrighteous. No man can plead that he has fulfilled all his obligations to God and

CHAPTER II.

Those who judge others, and yet transgress themselves, are inexcusable, and cannot escape the judgment of God, 1—6. The measure of his dealings with Jews and Gentiles as it will appear at the day of judgment, 7—16. The apostle solemnly expostulates with the Jews, who trusted in the law, and yet broke it; and shows that external forms will not profit, without a renewed heart and internal piety, which God would accept even in the uncircumcised, 17—29.

THEREFORE [a]thou art inexcusable, [b]O man, [c]whosoever thou art that judgest: for wherein thou judgest another, thou condemnest thyself; [d]for thou that judgest doest the same things.

2 But we are sure that [e]the judgment of God is according to truth, against them which commit such things.

3 And [f]thinkest thou this, [g]O man, that judgest them which do such things, and doest the same, [h]that thou shalt escape the judgment of God?

4 Or [i]despisest thou [k]the riches of his goodness, [l]and forbearance, and long-suffering; not knowing that [m]the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance?

to his neighbour; nor can any one truly say, that he has not "held the truth in unrighteousness," or that he has acted up completely to the light afforded him.—Whatever may be pleaded to the contrary, it is a certain fact, that atheism, infidelity, impiety, and idolatry spring from human depravity, not from unavoidable ignorance or mistake. The heathen nations might have known enough of God from his works, and the benefits conferred on them, to have excited their admiring love and gratitude, and to have influenced them to adore and obey their Creator and Benefactor; had they not shut out the light, or sinned in opposition to it: so that even they "were without excuse" in their apostacy and idolatry, however succeeding rebels against God may have vindicated and justified them. But, instead of glorifying him in humble gratitude, according to their measure of information, their pride and enmity induced them to indulge vain conjectures and reasonings; till their professed and boasted wisdom led them into the most palpable and degrading folly and stupidity. Thus idolatry, the stigma of man's understanding, was introduced and propagated, through the wickedness of his heart; and rational creatures exchanged the worship of the glorious Creator for that of brutes, reptiles, or inanimate images: and they continued to wander from God, till all traces of true religion must have been wholly lost, had not divine revelation, and especially that of the gospel, prevented it.

V. 22—32. Whatever speculators may assume, of the sufficiency of man's reason to discover divine truth and moral obligation, or to regulate men's practice; stubborn facts confute the flattering hypothesis: and as far as God has in awful displeasure left men to themselves, they have dishonoured him by the most absurd idolatries and superstitions, and degraded themselves by "vile affections," and abominable lusts: nor is it generally expedient to mention the enormities, to which they, who, "liking not to retain God in their knowledge," preferred their own inventions to his holy worship, have been given up; when, being left to "a reprobate mind," their deluded judgments, their perverse wills, and their depraved passions, have reciprocally helped to corrupt, and have been corrupted by, each other. A most horrid view of the moral character of the Greeks and Romans, even amidst all their prosperity, politeness, and erudition, is here set before us by the apostle: and the student, who judges of characters and actions by the law of God, will perceive, that our own historians, orators, and poets, amidst all their flattery and false colouring, adduce such facts, and make such representations, as fully prove the apostle's picture to be a real and striking likeness, and no caricature. Nay, the most illustrious and celebrated persons among them may be produced, as most exactly answering to this horrid description!—it must indeed be thankfully acknowledged, that Christianity has had considerable effect on mankind in general, in giving them more just notions of excellence, and in humanizing their manners, especially in respect of war: so that battles sometimes in later ages are scarcely more fierce and bloody, than the diversions of the savage Romans were. Our laws and customs also restrain, and drive into dark recesses, those abominations, which stalked abroad with horrid effrontery among the Pagans. There are also great numbers of real Christians among us. Yet, after all, what multitudes, even in this land, seem to be the original of the picture before us! They are full of all unrighteousness, and commit all uncleanness with greediness; or they gratify their enormous avarice by frauds, oppressions, extortion, and cruelty; or they are full of envy, deceit, contention, ambition, ostentation, malice, or malignity. Some rush upon murder from a diabolical pride and revenge, which they call honour; others vent their malice by whispering calumnies and slanders, to ruin their neighbour's reputation. Multitudes are so ingenious in contriving new species of fraud, perjury, impiety, or dishonesty; that legislators cannot keep pace with them, in devising new statutes to counteract their villany. While disobedience to parents is, alas! shamefully common; children are often as shamefully turned over to hirelings, and neglected by their parents, as if they were "without natural affection:" and it is too obvious, that numbers are implacable and unmerciful to those whom they can exult over or oppress with impunity. Thus men show themselves to be "haters of God," and his holy service: not only by doing such things as he has forbidden, and adjudged deserving of his wrath, but by applauding, and taking pleasure in the company of those, who blaspheme his name and trample on his authority, as though they were the most worthy, generous, and excellent of the human race: while the pious servants of God are proportionably despised and shunned. These are they, who would discard revelation, and who count "the preaching of the cross foolishness." But their conduct demonstrates their need of it, and that it is a remedy which they must avail themselves of, or perish.—Finally, we may here observe, that religion moderates and regulates natural affections, but excess of depravity extinguishes them: that it is a proof of more determined impiety, for men to take pleasure in the company of the enemies of God, than to commit many crimes, whilst the heart and conscience protest against them: and that it is a peculiar cause for gratitude, if we have been restrained from these enormities, to which by nature we are as propense as any others of our apostate race.

NOTES.—CHAP. II. V. 1—3. The apostle is commonly supposed to have here passed from the state of the Gentiles, to animadvert on that of the Jews: though some think that the heathen philosophers and moralists were also included. He, however, seems to have expressed himself in a general manner, that he might include all those, of every nation, sentiment, or description, "who hold the truth in unrighteousness," or object to "the righteousness of God by faith," (Notes, 1:17—20.) and who are ready to judge and condemn others, though guilty themselves. Of these, the Jews were the most notorious: for they disdained and abhorred the Gentiles as profane, abominable, and utterly excluded from the favour of God; and they thought themselves a holy people, entitled to all their privileges by an unalienable right. Yet, while they would join with the apostle in showing the inexcusable wickedness of the Gentiles, they were equally or more "inexcusable:" for they proudly arrogated, and severely exercised the office of a judge, though the sentence, which they denounced on others, actually condemned themselves; as they might be proved guilty of the very same crimes, or such as were of similar malignity. (Marg. Ref. a—d.) They copied the vices of the very heathen, whom they condemned: like them they acted in opposition to the light afforded them; and they were unthankful, rebellious, and unrighteous, even as the Gentiles were. But they, and all other persons in the world, whosoever they were that acted in this manner, must be reminded that assuredly, "the judgment of God," according to the truth of his word, and the real character and conduct of men, would be executed on them: and instead of meeting with favour on account of their external advantages, or their condemnation of sin in others, their punishment would be enhanced by these very circumstances. For could any man suppose, that when he had committed the same crimes, which he judged deserving of punishment in others, he should himself escape the judgment of God? This intimated to the unbelieving Jews, that personal and national judgments awaited them, unless they fled for refuge to the grace of the gospel. (Marg. Ref. e—h. Notes, Matt. 3:7—10. Luke 12:47,48. Heb. 2:1—4. 12:22—25.)—'These Gentiles were by the Jews reputed as unclean, great sinners, and so incapable of salvation.... To these Jews, the apostle in this chapter directs his discourse, proving here, that they who lived under the law wanted this justification as much as others, being also great sinners; and in the following chapters, that neither they nor the Gentiles could obtain this justification by the law.' Whithy.—The outward wickedness of the Jews was enormous at this time, as Josephus has shown: in this sense they copied the worst crimes (gross idolatry excepted) of the despised Gentiles; and their superior advantages rendered their conduct still more atrocious. (Notes, Matt. 7:1—5. Jam. 4:11,12.)

lious, he had still exercised immense goodness, forbearance, and long-suffering towards them; and he had at length sent his Son among them. Even after they had crucified him, he had in infinite mercy ordered the first proposals of his gospel to be made to them; and he still besought them, by his apostles and ministers, to accept of this salvation! And did they despise all this, as a small favour? Did it embolden them to continue in sin? Or did the Lord's abundant mercy and patience towards them lead them to conclude, that he would always favour them, however ungratefully they rebelled against him? (Marg. Ref. i—l. Note, Luke 24:44—49, v. 47.) If they thus despised his rich goodness, they strangely mistook its design and tendency; as it ought to lead and induce them to repentance.—The more kindness God exercises, the greater aggravation is there in the sinner's disobedience, and the more deeply should he be humbled for his base ingratitude. The patience of God gives the sinner time and opportunity for repentance, and the discoveries of his mercy furnish him with motives and encouragements; and were it not for man's total depravity, the proposals of the gospel must prevail with every one to repent of his departure from God, and to return to his worship and service. (Marg. Ref. m. Notes and P. O. Luke 15:1—24. 2 Pet. 3:9,14—16.)—If the Jews presumed upon the special kindness of God to them; and continued to reject the gospel, and to disobey his commandments, according to the "hardness of their impenitent hearts," their condemnation would be proportionably severe; and the longer God had patience with them, the heavier vengeance would be executed on them. All others indeed, who thus employed the day of mercy in committing sin, and hardening their hearts in impenitence, because of the goodness of God, would find that they had accumulated wrath as a treasure "for themselves," which would be secured for them, till the day of wrath and final recompense. (Marg. Ref. n—p.) Then the Lord will manifest the perfect justice of his decisions before the whole world, to the full satisfaction of all his friends, and the confusion of all his enemies: seeing he will then render to every individual "according to his works;" whether he was an obstinate unbeliever, or a humble penitent believer in the divine Redeemer. V. 7—11. The apostle here gradually proceeds to a more explicit mention of the Jews, whom he especially intended to "conclude under sin." (Gal. 3:22.) According to the whole tenor of Scripture, as well as the dictates of common sense, no sinner can do well, till he repents, submits to God, and seeks mercy from him. The Jew who did this, must have respect to the types and promises of a Saviour, with which the law of Moses was replete, as well as to the preceptive part of it; and he alone, who did this, would perform any spiritual obedience. (Note, Ex. 19:5.) If then there was a man, any where, who embraced by faith the revelation of "glory, honour, and immortality," through the promised Messiah, made in the word of God, and was earnestly desirous of obtaining this blessing; if he sought the inheritance, by repenting, "ceasing to do evil, learning to do well," attending on the ordinances of God, obeying his commandments, and thus waiting patiently for the completion of his promises; and if he proved his sincerity, by patience under trials, and perseverance in well doing, amidst temptations and difficulties;—this man would surely be made partaker of eternal life, according to the constitution of the most gracious covenant of God in Jesus Christ; whatever measure of explicit knowledge he might be favoured with, or under whatever dispensation he might live. (Marg. Ref. s—x.) But, as all transgressors of the law are under condemnation; so those Jews, or others, who disputed against the Lord's method of saving sinners, and his sovereignty in dispensing unmerited favours; whose "eye was evil, because the Lord was good;" who were angry at the kindness shown to returning prodigals; (Note, Luke 15:25—32, v. 32.) and who refused to obey the truth, by embracing the gospel and submitting to the promised Saviour; choosing rather to "obey unrighteousness," and continue the slaves of sin and Satan; all these persons would surely sink under the indignation and wrath of their offended Judge. For "tribulation and anguish" of spirit must be the inevitable portion of "every soul of man, who worketh evil;" and the Jew will have the first and most severe lot in this condemnation: though the unbelieving and disobedient Gentile will not be exempted. (Marg. Ref. y—e.) On the other hand, that "glory, honour, and peace," which God confers on the objects of his peculiar love, will certainly be given to "every man that worketh good," as one who "obeyeth the truth." (8) The Jew indeed had the first proposal of this mercy; but no Gentile was excluded from the full participation of it, "For God is no respecter of persons." (Marg. Ref. f—i. Notes, Acts 10:1—8,34,35.)—It is evident that the apostle did not mean, that either Jew or Gentile could be saved by his own works, without faith in Christ; but that, "by obeying the truth," and by that "patient continuance in well doing" which springs from faith, the Gentile would obtain eternal life: and without this, the Jew must fall under wrath and condemnation. To suppose he meant, that any man, who heard the gospel without believing it; or who had any part of revelation sent to him, yet rejected it, could be saved; would absurdly make the apostle advance principles subversive of his own grand argument throughout the whole epistle, and of his doctrine in all his epistles. He had many reasons, for first proposing his doctrine in this covert and practical manner. He thus avoided giving immediate disgust to the Jewish reader, previous to the more explicit declaration of the gospel, for which he was here only making way: he intimated, that those, who really best understood and obeyed the law, would most readily embrace the gospel; and that the Jews did not refuse to "obey the truth" from love to the holiness of the law, but from "obedience to unrighteousness."

V. 12—16. No Gentiles could be found who had perfectly acted according to the light of their own dispensation; so that none of those could be justified by their own obedience: yet, as they had "sinned without law," or without the advantages of a written authenticated rule for their conduct; they would "perish without law;" and be consigned to a milder punishment than the wicked Jews would be; who having sinned "in," or under, "the law," would be judged by the law, and fall under the awful curses denounced in it against the disobedient. (See on Note, 4—6.) The Jews indeed were apt to imagine, that the reading and hearing of the law, together with some attention to the legal ceremonies, would justify them before God, and atone for all their violations of the moral precepts: just as many professed Christians expect to be justified by some general attendance on outward ordinances, and a decency of moral conduct, though they are habitually guilty of many known sins, and omit many evident duties. But the apostle declared, that the "hearers of the law could not be justified" by it: if they would seek acceptance in this way, they must be "doers" of the law: and if any thus perfectly performed its righteous demands, he might then indeed claim the reward of righteousness, but not otherwise. (Marg. Ref. k—o. Note, Luke 10:25—29.) For even the Gentiles, who had not the written law, when from natural principles they performed any of those duties which the law required, were, in this respect, "a law unto themselves:" and by obeying thus far their own rule, came nearer to righteousness, than the Jews who broke their rule. The fragments of that law, which had originally been written in the heart, exerting their influence by a natural sense of right and wrong, appeared in their works. Their consciences also testify to the propriety of this part of their conduct, and produced an inward satisfaction: while, at the same time, their secret thoughts, or their reasonings one with another, served to accuse, or excuse themselves, or each other, according to the conformity of their conduct to their own sentiments of right and wrong, or the contrary. If then the very Gentiles could not but condemn themselves, when they acted against their own consciences; how absurd and presumptuous must it be for a Jew, to expect justification before God, by a law which he was continually transgressing! (Marg. Ref. p—u.)—A man accused of a murder which he did not commit, finds his conscience acquit him in that respect; though it may accuse and condemn him of robbery: and his not being guilty of the murder is no reason why he should be justified, as to the robbery: Reuben's conscience excused him, as to the cruelty exercised towards Joseph; but it accused and condemned him for incest. (Notes, Gen. 35:22. 42:21,22. 49:3,4.) To "perish without law" is widely different from "justification unto life;" of which the apostle gives not so much as any intimation. (Note, Matt. 11:20—24.) The apostle's argument by no means implied, that the Gentiles performed any spiritual obedience; or that any of them could be justified, on account of their partial and scanty compliance with the dictates of their own natural, and in very many things erroneous conscience. As rational creatures, in a fallen state, yet not desperate, they sometimes acted more morally than at other times: and accordingly their consciences approved or disapproved of their conduct: and the same is the case, at this day, with infidels, and mere nominal Christians. This is an earnest and evidence of a future judgment, when God will judge the secret actions, thoughts, motives and affections of all men, by his Son Jesus Christ; which was one principal doctrine of the gospel, that Paul preached both to Jews and Gentiles. (Marg. Ref. x—z. Notes, Ec. 12:11—14. 1 Cor. 4:3—5. 2 Cor. 5:9—12, v. 10.)—As the apostle plainly says, that "as many as have sinned without law, shall perish without law;" it is surprising, that any expositors should have thought the case of Job and his friends, and Cornelius, to be referred to. Probably Job lived and died before the law; and he had traditional revelation, as the patriarchs had: and Cornelius, though not observant of the ceremonial law, had the Scriptures of the Old Testament, and by the grace of God had studied them to good purpose. (Notes, Acts 10:1—8.)—It was indisputably the apostle's object, to convince his readers, that neither revelation, nor the light of reason and conscience, could save those who failed of obeying them; that all had in many things failed, however, in particular instances, some had been obedient; and that all must perish, though with different degrees of aggravation, unless saved by the gospel.—'Hell hath no power over sinners of Israel, because Abraham and Isaac descend thither to fetch them thence.... No circumcised person goes to hell: God having promised to deliver them from it, for the merit of circumcision.... All Israelites have their portion in the world to come; and that notwithstanding their sins; yea, though they were condemned here for their wickedness.' Extracts from Jewish writers in Whithy.—It would not be easy to produce any passage from modern writers, in which proud self-righteousness and rank antinomianism are so completely combined: but a considerable portion of the same leaven, may often be discerned both among papists and protestants.

V. 17—24. In order to understand this chapter, it should constantly be kept in mind, that the apostle is combating the prejudices and presumption of the Jews, to whom he expected the epistle would be shown, and whose influence he knew would be employed, to unsettle the minds of the believers at Rome. The Gentiles are therefore introduced, by way of illustrating the argument, and not in order to show in what way they may be justified. (Note, 12—16.)—The apostle here immediately addressed himself to any Jew, who was willing to take up the argument. He supposed him to rest his hope of acceptance on the law, and this with great quietness and satisfaction; and to "boast of God," as standing in a covenant-relation to him. He thought himself well acquainted with the will of God; and, as an expert casuist, he could "distinguish things which differed," and give the preference to such as were more excellent, having from his youth been instructed out of the law. (Marg. Ref. a—e.) In this confidence he thought himself qualified to guide and enlighten the blind and benighted pagans; and to instruct such as became proselytes, whom he deemed foolish, and mere babes, compared with himself: as he had got a complete knowledge of the whole law, having the form of it in his memory and mind. This, however, was a mere semblance, and outside appearance of the spiritual knowledge, and true meaning of the law, which, rightly understood, would lead him to trust in 26 Therefore if the uncircumcision keep the righteousness of the law, shall not his uncircumcision be counted for circumcision?

27 And shall not uncircumcision which is by nature, [v]if it fulfil the law, [z]judge thee, who [y]by the letter and circumcision dost transgress the law?

29 But he is a Jew [c]which is one inwardly; [d]and circumcision is that of the heart, [e]in the Spirit, and not in the letter; [f]whose praise is not of men, but of God.

the promised and typified Redeemer, and not in the law itself. In this form he rested, without even attempting to obey all the precepts of the law, according to his own exposition; as if his work had been to instruct others, and not himself! or as if he meant to insult the great Lawgiver, by studying his commandments in order to break them! (Marg. Ref. f—i. Notes, 3:19,20. 7:7—12. Gal. 2:17—21.) Did such a man explain and enforce the law against theft, and then practise dishonesty? Did he commit adultery, after quoting and explaining the seventh commandment? Did he sacrilegiously embezzle the sacred treasures, or defraud the Lord of his dues, through an idolatrous love of money, after having expressed his abhorrence of idolatry? (Marg. Ref. k—o.) It was notorious, that many of the chief priests, scribes, and elders, who appeared most zealous for the law, were guilty of these and similar crimes: and the rest, who rejected the gospel, and "made their boast in the law," would be found to dishonour God, by evidently breaking it. For, in fact, the name of God was blasphemed among the Gentiles, and they were set against true religion, by the wickedness of the Jews; as it had been written in their Scriptures, and indeed had been a charge brought frequently by the prophets against their fathers. (Marg. Ref. p, q.) The terms here used concerning the Gentiles, aptly expose the arrogant self-wisdom of the Jews.—'This passage may be illustrated from the Jewish writings: for they say, that he who teacheth others, what he doeth not himself, is like a blind man who hath a candle in his hand to give light to others, whilst he himself doth walk in darkness.' Jewish writings quoted by Whitby.—Blasphemed, &c. (24) Of this, Josephus doth frequently accuse them, saying, "What wickedness do you conceal or hide, which is not known to your enemies? You triumph in your wickedness, strive daily who shall be most vile, making a show of your wickedness, as if it were virtue.' And thinkest thou this, O man, that thou shalt escape the judgment of God, who punisheth the Gentiles, when thou art as guilty as they of acting against thy conscience, and doing that for which thy own mouth condemns thee; ... and which doth also cause them to "blaspheme that holy name by which thou art called?" Whitby. (Note, 1—3.)

V. 25—29. The Jews, though chargeable with the grossest violations of the moral law, confided in circumcision, as if it had secured their covenant-relation to God. But the apostle showed them, that while circumcision, and the means of grace connected with it, would be very advantageous to the conscientious Jew, who copied the example of Abraham (Note, 3:1,2.) especially in bringing him acquainted with the oracles of God, and preparing him to receive the gospel; it could not profit the presumptuous transgressor, who rested in it, and neglected that "righteousness by faith" of which it was the seal. (Note, 4:9—12.) If a man cleaved to the law, he must perfectly obey it, in order to justification; circumcision made "him a debtor to fulfil the whole law:" and his transgressions cast him out of the covenant of God, as if he had never been circumcised. (Marg. Ref. r, s. Note, Gal. 5:1 —6.) On the other hand, if an uncircumcised Gentile should regulate his conduct according to the righteousness prescribed by the law; ought he not to be deemed a true worshipper of God, notwithstanding his uncircumcision? Such Gentiles, as were taught by divine grace thus to love and serve God, would, like Cornelius, embrace the gospel when proposed to them: and thus in uncircumcision, the external natural state of man, they, being made partakers of an inward spiritual change, would judge and condemn the Jew, who, having the letter of the law and the outward circumcision, had no inward disposition to obedience. (Marg. Ref. t—x. Notes, Acts 10:1—8. Gal. 6:11—16. Phil. 3:1—7, v. 3.) For, in fact, that man was not to be counted a Jew, or one of the chosen people of God, who was only so in his outward profession or descent; nor was that the true circumcision, the valid seal of the covenant, "which was outward in the flesh." But he was the real Jew, or child of Abraham, who had the inward disposition of his believing and obedient progenitor; and that was "the true circumcision," which was wrought in the heart by regeneration, according to the spiritual meaning, and not the mere letter, of the law: producing an inward conformity of the judgment and affections to its holy precepts. (Marg. Ref. z—d. Notes, Gen. 17:9—12. Lev. 26:41,42. Deut. 30:1—10, v. 10. Jer. 9:25,26.) This indeed men could not see, or would not approve and commend, but rather despise and hate; but God would approve, commend, and value it. So that, though the outward seal had been for the time necessary; yet the inward grace, or the thing signified, was always far more excellent: and the former was now superseded by the Christian dispensation, and could be of no use to those who tenaciously adhered to it. (Marg. Ref. e. Notes, Acts 7: 51—53. Gal. 4:8—11,21—31. Heb. 10:26,27. 1 Pet. 3:1—4, v. 4.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. The censures which men pass on their neighbours, who perhaps justly deserve them, may render themselves more inexcusable, while "they do the same things, and yet trust in themselves that they are righteous, and despise others."—The branches of man's disobedience are numerous, yet they all spring from the same root: nor can any one judge another to be deserving of divine wrath, without at the same time condemning himself: for, though he may not have committed exactly the same crimes; yet he has been guilty of the same apostacy from God, and rebellion against him; and is equally chargeable with sinning against his better judgment in various ways. Frequently, superior advantages render a man's apparently lighter offences more aggravated, in the sight of God, than the more scandalous sins of his worse educated neighbour, against which he vehemently declaims. We are indeed very incompetent judges of the comparative heinousness of men's conduct: but it is certain that "the judgment of God is" and will be "according to truth," against all who break his law, and reject his grace. To him we ought to leave others, and to be chiefly concerned to judge ourselves, and to seek mercy according to his blessed gospel, that his truth in fulfilling his promises may secure our salvation.—If our fellow-sinners cannot stand before us in judgment; how shall we, who are guilty of the same things, escape the righteous condemnation of a heart-searching God? In deciding against them we pass sentence on ourselves; and "if our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart and knoweth all things." (Notes, Jam. 2:8—13. 1 John 3:18—24, vv. 18—20.)—The excuses, which numbers make for their misconduct, may very commonly be turned against them: nor would men in general be so daringly wicked, were it not for their experience of the Lord's forbearance, and their general notions of his mercy! (Note, Ec. 8:11—13.) But those who thus "despise the riches of his goodness and forbearance," and grow more bold in rebellion by that kindness, which should "lead them to repentance," will find at last that they have been "sinning against their own souls;" and that their "hard and impenitent hearts" have led them "to treasure up wrath against the day of wrath and revelation of the righteous judgment of God."—Indeed this is the daily employment of every unbeliever; and he adds to his store, with a rapidity of increase, proportioned to his crimes and abused advantages! He himself will certainly reap the harvest which he now sows, and the longer he is spared in the long-suffering of God, the more terrible will be the day of righteous retribution, if he continue to the end in this destructive course. (Notes, Luke 7:40—43. Gal. 6:6—10, vv. 7,8. 2 Pet. 2:4—9.)

V. 7—16. The questions concerning justification, personal

CHAPTER III.

The advantages which the Jews possessed, 1, 2. The unbelief of some does not render the faith of God of no effect, 3, 4; who is just in punishing sin, though he takes occasion from it to display his own glory, 5—8. Passages from the Old Testament adduced to prove that the Jews, as well as others, are "all under sin," 9—19; so that no flesh is justified by the deeds of the law, 20. The "righteousness of God without the law," is "unto all and upon all that believe," without any difference, 21, 22. As all have sinned, whether Jews or Gentiles; all must be justified by the free grace of God, through faith in Christ, and the redemption of his blood, that God may be glorified, and boasting excluded, 23—30. This establishes the law, 31.

WHAT [a]advantage then hath the Jew? or what profit is there of circumcision?

election, and efficacious grace, should be kept distinct from those which relate to the character and conduct of the righteous and the wicked. If a man cannot be satisfied with an earthly portion, but aspires after "glory, honour, and immortality;" and if he seeks this inheritance, by faith in the promises of God, and "patient continuance in well-doing," he doubtless is in the way to eternal life. But if men contend against the precepts and sanction of God's holy law, and his decrees and dispensations, his truths and ordinances, or blame any thing rather than their own sins; if they "do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness," and live in allowed violations of the divine law; no doubt they are in the broad road to destruction; and, proceeding in that path, "indignation and wrath" will overtake them, to whatever church or sect they may belong, or whatever creed they may subscribe. Indeed, "tribulation and anguish" must come upon all impenitent evil-doers: but "glory, honour, and peace" will be awarded to all, "who are taught by the grace of God, to live soberly and righteously, and godly in this present world;" "for there is no respect of persons with God." (Notes, Tit. 2:11—14.) Whatever may now be objected to this, from some doctrines ill understood, or from appearances in providence which are misinterpreted; it will be made manifest to all the world, in the day when "God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ;" as he has assured us he will, in his holy gospel. Then those who, not having the written word, have sinned against the dictates of their own consciences, will be proved guilty, and condemned by that rule: those who have sinned against the law of God, which was made known to them, will be judged and punished according to that law; and the professors of the gospel will be shown to have been either true believers or hypocrites, according to the effects produced by the truth on their minds, and hearts, and conduct. (Notes, and P. O. Matt. 25:31—46.) For if the very Gentiles were "a law unto themselves" and each other, when they acted contrary to "the work of the law written in their hearts;" how absurd must it be for any man to expect acceptance with God by a written law, which he hears and disobeys; or by the gospel, when he does not practically believe it! No man can indeed be justified by his own obedience, because all men deviate from their rule: yet the nearer they act in conformity to their principles and convictions, the lighter will be their condemnation; and the greater the distance there is between their known rule and their allowed practice, the more aggravated must be their guilt; when the secrets of men shall be brought to light, and all these infinitely important concerns shall be determined by the omniscient, most righteous, and yet most merciful Judge.

V. 17—29. The Jew, who "rested in the law, and made his boast of God," and was proud of his superior knowledge and attainments, will at the last day be more deeply condemned than the blind Gentile whom he so greatly disdained: and numbers, 'who call themselves Christians,' and have learned many right notions of the gospel as a system, and so deem themselves the children of God, though they "obey not the truth," will perish more dreadfully than their more ignorant neighbours, who have sinned against less light and inferior advantages. Indeed the sermons which many preach, and the books which they publish, will testify against them; and it behooves ministers especially, to be most awfully jealous over themselves in this respect: for it is far more congenial to the self-flattery of our hearts and our worldly lusts to instruct others, than to bear the yoke ourselves. Many teach their hearers the truth and will of God, who never teach themselves; they lay down good rules but never practise them: and the discoveries of the great day will show, that some, who appeared to be "the guides of the blind, and the light of such as sat in darkness," were indeed dishonest men, adulterers, or sacrilegious mercenaries. Numbers despise their ignorant neighbours for resting in a dead "form of godliness," and yet they themselves trust in "a form of knowledge," which is equally lifeless and inefficacious: and many glory in the gospel, whose unholy lives dishonour God and cause his name and truth to be blasphemed among his enemies. In short, no forms, ordinances, or notions can profit us, without regeneration by the Holy Spirit: which will always eventually lead us to seek an interest in "the righteousness of God by faith." The distinction between truth and error, and between divine institutions and human inventions, is indeed immutable and most important: yet a man may be alive to God, who maintains some errors, cleaves to some superstitions, and forms improper conclusions in respect of some divine appointments: while another, who is very clear in his notions, and exact in externals, may be "dead in sin," "uncircumcised in heart;" and, through the letter and the outward form, he may deceive himself, and be a scandal to the gospel. For he is no more a Christian now, than he was a Jew of old, who is one outwardly; "neither is that baptism, which is outward in the flesh:" but he is the real Christian who is inwardly a true believer, with an obedient faith; and the true baptism is that of the heart, by "the washing of regeneration and the renewal of the Holy Ghost," producing a spiritual mind, and a cordial subjection to the truth, in its holy import and tendency. A Christian of this character will seldom be much approved by zealots of any party, any more than by the world at large: but he will be accepted of God, and at length welcomed with the praise of God, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

NOTES.—CHAP. III. V. 1, 2. If disobedient Jews could not be accepted, and if obedient Gentiles might be saved; it would be asked, "What advantage has the Jew" above the Gentile? or in what respect does circumcision profit him? (Marg. Ref. a. Note, 2:25—29.) The whole Old Testament implied, that God had peculiarly favoured the posterity of Abraham; and the law, together with the "seal of circumcision," had been supposed to convey some special privileges: and did the apostle mean to level all these distinctions, and to prove that the Jews had no advantage from their relation to Abraham, and their national covenant? To this he replied, that they, as a collective body, had doubtless much benefit from them in every way. (Note, 9:4,5.) The law and circumcision could not indeed save them in their sins, or by their own efficacy; yet they gave them most important advantages for obtaining salvation. The stated ministry of the priests, the occasional messages of the prophets, the ordinances of the temple, the worship at the synagogues, their education in an acquaintance with the true God, and at a distance from gross idolatry, the many good examples which were set before them, and the dispensations of Providence respecting them, were means of grace, which probably were made effectual to the conversion and salvation of more persons in that one nation, from age to age, than were converted in all the rest of the world. But especially "the oracles of God," the sacred writings of Moses and the prophets, were "committed to them;" and the written word of God had been continued among them through their several generations, to direct them how to seek acceptance with God, and to walk before him. In them the Messiah was promised, and the various particulars of his character, miracles, redemption, and kingdom, were typified and predicted; among the Jews he made his appearance in the appointed time; in him the Scriptures were fulfilled before their eyes, and numbers of them had believed in him, and found salvation by him. (Marg. Ref. b—e.)—Oracles, &c. (2) Some think the Scriptures are thus called, with reference to the oracular answers, which the high-priest delivered, when he consulted the Lord by the breastplate of judgment: (Note, Ex. 28:30.) implying that they were as immediately and entirely the word of God, as the oracles thus delivered had been.—'This is so remarkable and important a testimony to the divine inspiration of the Old Testament in general, that it can leave no doubt concerning the full persuasion of St. Paul on this head.' Doddridge.—Committed, &c.] Or, "they were intrusted with the oracles of God."—'The oracles of God were deposited with the Jews, not to keep to themselves, but to publish them to all the world besides; but because they did not this work sufficiently, it is Christ's appointment to the apostles, that they should disperse themselves unto all nations, and so bring them to the knowledge of his will.' Hammond.—It behooves Christians in every age to remember, that the Scriptures are thus committed or intrusted to them also, in order that they may communicate the blessing to all around them, and to all who shall come after them, and to all men, throughout the earth, by every proper means, to the utmost of their ability and to preserve them uncorrupted and entire, for this purpose. In this latter respect, the Jews have fulfilled their trust, to a degree of exactness, which could never have been previously expected: (Note, Prov. 22:12.) and, while their frivolous and minute exactness, in many things, is apt to excite contempt; their fairness, in preserving the sacred text from intentional alteration, is evident in almost all passages, even where their own rejection of the Messiah appears most criminal. It is the present plan of their Rabbins, to fright the people from reading such portions of the Scripture.

V. 3, 4. What if some, if even the greater part of the nation of Israel, from worldly and ambitious motives, had obstinately and wickedly rejected this divine Saviour? Did their unbelief render the faithfulness of God ineffectual? He had fulfilled his promises to their fathers; and if they would not receive and submit to the "Seed of Abraham," and the Son of David, could they plead that God had failed of his word, because he would not continue his special favour to them, notwithstanding their disobedience and atrocious wickedness? (Notes, 15:8—13. Luke 1:46—55,67—75.) "God forbid," that such a thought should be allowed in any one's mind! Let the thought be abhorred; let every man rather humbly acknowledge the veracity and faithfulness of God; though it should require him to suppose that all men were liars, hypocrites, or deceivers, as every one in some degree must be allowed to be. (Marg. Ref. f—k. Note, Ps. 62:8—10.) Let the blame of the rejection of the Messiah rest on them, and their hypocrisy, and not be supposed to reflect upon the faithfulness of God: even as David, when he had committed grievous offences, acknowledged that God was, by his crimes, "justified" in his declarations concerning the desperate wickedness of the human heart; and that the humiliating event was permitted, to display more clearly the truth, justice, and mercy of God; and that he might be fully vindicated from all those presumptuous charges, by which men venture to arraign the testimonies of his word, the threatenings of his law, or the dispensations of his providence. (Marg. Ref. l. Note, Ps. 51:4.) The quotation is exactly from the LXX.

V. 5—8. To the foregoing conclusion of the apostle, the Jews or other cavillers might reply, that if "their unrighteousness" gave occasion to the more illustrious manifestation of the divine justice, or rather to the showing more evidently the necessity and excellency of "the righteousness of God" for man's justification; would he not be unrighteous, if he took vengeance on them, for those actions which eventually occasioned the more conspicuous display of his glory? (Marg. Ref. m—o. Note, 5:20,21.) This objection the apostle adduced "as a man," an unbeliever, who purposed to justify himself, and find fault with the sentence of God against him. (Marg. Ref. p. Note, 9:19—21.)—In fact, the wickedness and obstinate unbelief of the Jews fully proved the need, which all men have of "the righteousness of God by faith;" and also his justice, in punishing them for their sins, and in the sentence of the law against all transgressors: and thus in every sense it "commended his righteousness." Yet the thought, that it would be unjust in him to take vengeance on them, ought to be rejected with abhorrence: for, if he could not justly punish those crimes which made way for the display of his glory, how could he judge the world? (Marg. Ref. r. Note, Gen. 18:23—26.) In that case he never could inflict vengeance on any criminal: for he will take occasion, from the rebellion of all fallen creatures, however distinguished, to display his own glorious perfections to the greater advantage; though the intention of transgressors, and the natural tendency of their conduct, are diametrically contrary to both. So that this proves still more fully the malignity of sin, as committed against a Being of such infinite wisdom, power and perfection, that he effects good to his creation, and glory to himself, by occasion of those very actions, which naturally tend to the destruction of his creatures, and the dishonour of his name. (Notes, Gen. 50:20. Is. 10:5—14. 55:8,9. Eph. 3:9—12.)—This objection might for substance be stated in another way: 'Suppose the truth of God, in his predictions, promises, or denunciations, should be more abundantly manifested to his glory, by any man's telling a wilful lie: why should the liar be punished for giving occasion to the display of God's glory?' Yet every one must see, that the lie thus told was directly contrary to the truth of God, and merely the occasion of displaying it: and the event could not deduct from the malignity of the lie. (Marg. Ref. s, t. Notes, Gen. 12. 11—16. 27:6—29.) If it were in any case admitted, that a violation of the law of God ceased to be criminal, because his glory was eventually promoted by it; then the slanderous report, circulated concerning the Christians by those who, misunderstanding the doctrine of salvation by grace, affirmed that they said, "Let us do evil, that good may come," would indeed be established as a general principle; and as the rule of man's conduct, instead of the holy and perfect law of God. But, in fact, the condemnation of those who thus perverted the gospel, or who committed sin that good might come from it, was most righteous. The blame of their sins belonged only to themselves; the honour of the good done by occasion of them, to God alone. (Marg. Ref. u, x.)—Different opinions indeed are advanced concerning the persons, of whom the apostle said, "whose damnation is just." Some interpret it of the Jews and others who reject the gospel: but this proposition, though true, seems not to rise out of the context, or belong to the argument. Others apply the awful sentence to the calumniators, who charged the Christians with saying, "Let us do evil that good may come:" but the clause, "as we be slanderously reported, &c." is, I think properly, included in a parenthesis, that it may not interrupt the main subject. The apostle evidently intended to show that God may justly, and will certainly punish those sins, which yet eventually prove the occasion of more conspicuously manifesting his glory. Now, if this were not the case, it might be said, "Let us do evil that good may come:" but on the contrary, whatever blasphemers may assert, this proposition is so contrary to the real nature and genius of the gospel, that every intelligent minister or Christian will be forward to allow the condemnation of those, who thus encourage themselves in sin, under a vain imagination that good will follow to be undeniably righteous. (Note, 6:1,2.) The floodgates of licentiousness are opened by such a view of the gospel.—Yet even apparently religious persons often tolerate, nay zealously promote, practices which cannot be denied to be deviations from truth and integrity, and vindicate them, because good is thus done. In this way, however, the standard of integrity is (dreadful to say!) fixed lower, in some particulars, among numbers who are zealous for the gospel, than among respectable worldly people; who are, by noticing these things, exceedingly prejudiced against evangelical truth.—Nay, the same false principle is brought forward, in another and more fashionable form, when utility, and not "the law of God" is made the standard of morality, and a main principle of reasonings on moral obligation. It is, on these accounts, most obvious to suppose, that the apostle meant, though in a cursory manner, to bear a most decisive testimony against a maxim, which, carried to its consequences, is destructive of all practical religion; and against those who, professing Christianity, countenanced and acted according to it.

more able to justify themselves before God by their own works, or without "the righteousness of faith?" No, in "no wise:" for "we have before lodged the indictment against both Jews and Gentiles, that they are all under sin." (Marg. and Marg. Ref. y—a. Notes, 1:18—32. 2:) They had all, in manifold instances, violated the known rule of their conduct, and were under condemnation as transgressors, unless delivered by the mercy and grace of God according to the gospel. To this indictment, on which the Gentiles had been convicted, the Jews pleaded, "Not guilty:" and therefore, besides the evidence already brought against them from notorious facts, and the nature of the case, the apostle produced several passages of the Scriptures against them. In these, it was not intimated that circumcision, the written law, the ceremonial observances, or the national covenant, would excuse their crimes, or entitle them to the favour of God; as the unbelieving Jews vainly imagined. And if these charges were true of the greater part of the nation in former times; could it be supposed, that the Jews, when the apostle wrote, were better by nature, or merely as circumcised, or as having the law, than their forefathers had been? It was expressly written of them, that in themselves, and by their works, there was not one of them righteous: that there were none of them, who understood the character, truth, and will of God, or their own interest and duty; or who earnestly sought to know him, and find happiness in his favour: they had all forsaken the way of holy obedience, they were all become unprofitable, in respect of the great end of their creation, and their peculiar advantages; so that none of them employed themselves in glorifying God, and doing good to man. (Marg. Ref. b—i. Notes, Ps. 14:1—3.) Their throats, by their insatiable luxury, or rather by their filthy communications, resembled the sepulchre when opened to receive the dead, or when emitting its nauseous and infectious vapors. (Marg. Ref. k. Note, Ps. 5:9.) Deceit and dissimulation seemed the chief use of their tongues; their slanders, seductions, and flatteries were under their lips, as the fatal "poison of asps:" instead of pious and kind words, their mouths were filled with imprecations, perjuries, and bitter revilings. (Marg. Ref. l—n. Notes, Ps. 10:2—11. 140:3.) They were eager to shed blood, in revenge, ambition, or avarice: (Notes, Prov. 1:10—14. Is. 59:3—8.) they knew not the ways, in which godly men walk at peace with God and their neighbours; and therefore they went on in those paths, which lead to misery and ruin, both to themselves and each other. (Marg. Ref. p.) In short they had cast the fear of God behind their backs, and habitually disregarded his authority, threatenings, precepts, and judgments. (Marg. Ref. q. Note, Ps. 36:1.) —A few exceptions, by the mercy and grace of God, there doubtless were to these general rules; and the apostle intended very soon to show how these persons were made to differ: but these quotations were full to the point, to show the Jews, that they were as unable to justify themselves before God as the Gentiles were.—For if, in the days of David and Isaiah, this had been the general character of the people; the acceptance, and holiness, of any among them, must arise from some other cause, than their national covenant and external privileges.—Most of these texts are quoted nearly from the Septuagint, without material alteration. They are indeed all, except the first clause, found together in many editions of the Septuagint in the fourteenth Psalm, and exactly as quoted by the apostle. (Note, Ps. 14:2,3.) But it is more likely, that some transcriber inserted the passage from this epistle, than that the arrangement was made by the Greek translators themselves.

V. 19, 20. It was well known, that the things which were written in the law (or in the Old Testament,) were immediately addressed to those "who were under the law," and had the benefit of divine revelation; or to the nation of Israel, and not to the Gentiles. (Marg. Ref. r. Note, 2:12—16.) This was intended to silence the objections of the Jews, who broke the law in which they rested; and indeed in this manner "every mouth must be stopped," and "all the world must become," or be proved, "guilty before God:" as it was not supposed that the Gentiles were more free from guilt, than his peculiar people Israel. So that, in fact, every sinner's plea must be silenced; either in this life as a humble penitent before God's mercy-seat, or as a condemned criminal before his judgment-seat. (Marg. Ref. s, t.) From these premises it evidently followed, that no one of the whole fallen race could be justified before God, by his own obedience to the law: for by the law sin is discovered, exposed, and condemned. The straightness of that perfect rule detects and makes known the crookedness of men's dispositions and actions; and it must therefore convict the transgressor as guilty, instead of pronouncing him not guilty, or a righteous person. (Marg. Ref. u—z.)—Every attentive reader must observe, that the apostle uses the word "law" in various meanings; which is rather to be considered as the defect of human language, than the result of ambiguity in his style. But the context generally shows how the word is to be understood: and common sense, united with a teachable spirit, will usually determine this far better than critical learning; which is too often employed to perplex what is plain, rather than to clear up what is obscure. The nature of the argument requires us to suppose, that the apostle means the sacred Scriptures in general, when he says, "Whatsoever the law saith:" for the quotations are not from the law of Moses, and it is evident the whole Old Testament was thus spoken of. (Note, John 10:32—39, v 34.) When he spoke of the Jews, as "under the law," he evidently meant the whole legal dispensation, by which they were distinguished from the Gentiles. But when he says, "by the law is the knowledge of sin," he must be understood of the moral law especially, the extent, spirituality, and excellency of which shows what things are sinful, and how evil sin is: whereas the ceremonial law rather gave the knowledge of salvation, by prefiguring the shedding of that atoning blood, and the communication of that sanctifying grace, by which sin is taken away. (Notes, 7:7—12. John 1:17. 2 Cor. 3:7—11. Gal. 2:17—21, v. 19.)—Indeed this subject seems capable of an easy solution. If there be any law, which a man has perfectly kept, he may doubtless be justified by it; and surely no man can be justified by a law, which condemns him for breaking it! But, there is no law of God, which any man has kept: therefore no law by the deeds of which a man can be justified. The Gentile broke the law of his reason and conscience; the Jew broke the moral law; and even the attempt to justify himself by observing the ceremonial law, contradicted the very nature and intent of it. And as to that 'new law,' which requires sincere obedience as the condition of justification; those who dream of it should show us when it was promulgated, where it may be found, what it requires, whom it can condemn, or whom it can justify. When this is done, it may be worth while to prove, that it "makes void" both the law and the gospel: that it introduces a new, vague, and unintelligible rule of duty, which every man may interpret according to his own inclinations; that it introduces boasting, and unites together pharisaical pride and antinomian licentiousness. (Note, 29—31.) Yet this vague unscriptural notion, which is replete with such complicated absurdities, so well suits men's natural indolence of thought, in matters of religion; serves so conveniently to reconcile a quiet conscience with a worldly life; and so coincides with their enmity against both the holiness of the law, and the humiliating doctrines of the gospel; that perhaps it deceives more souls, than all other false systems of religion put together, in this superficial dissipated age.—'By law, which is the publishing of the rule with a penalty, we are not delivered from the power of sin, nor can it help men to righteousness: but by law we come experimentally to know sin, in the power and force of it, since we find it prevail upon us, notwithstanding the punishment of death is annexed to it.' Locke.—'The knowledge of sin, being chiefly by the moral law, (7:7.) shows, that the apostle excludes that, as well as the ceremonial law, from justification: and evident it is, that the antithesis runs all along not

21 ¶ But now [a]the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, [b]being witnessed by the law [c]and the prophets;

22 Even the righteousness of God, [d]which is by faith of Jesus Christ [e]unto all [f]and upon all them that believe; [g]for there is no difference:

23 For [h]all have sinned, and [i]come short [k]of the glory of God;

24 Being [l]justified freely by his grace, [m]through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus:

25 Whom God hath [n]set forth [o]to be a propitiation [p]through faith in his blood, [q]to declare his righteousness for [r]the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God;

26 To declare, I say, at this time his righteousness: [s]that he might be just, [t]and the Justifier of him which believeth in Jesus.

27 [u]Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? [v]of works? Nay; [w]but by the law of faith.

V. 21—26. The apostle, having "shut up all men under sin," (Note, Gal. 3:19—22, v. 22.) proceeds more explicitly to exhibit "the righteousness of God by faith," (Note, 1:17.) which had been manifestly declared by the preaching of the gospel. This is the righteousness, which God had appointed, provided, and introduced, in the Person of his Son. It was "without the law:" having no dependence on any man's personal obedience to the law, being entirely a distinct thing: no past obedience being in the least taken notice of as having any influence in the sinner's justification; and his subsequent obedience being intended for other purposes. It had nothing to do with the ceremonial law, except as it was the substance of some of its shadows: for the Jew, who accepted of this righteousness, would place no dependence on these externals: and the Gentile convert was not required to be circumcised, or to keep that law. Yet it had been "witnessed by the law and the prophets:" the ceremonies typified it; the very strictness of the moral law and its awful curses, being compared with the promises of mercy to sinners, implied it; the promises and predictions of the Messiah bore witness to it; the faith and hope of ancient believers recognized it: and the whole Old Testament, rightly understood, taught men to expect and depend on it. (Marg. Ref. a—c.) This "righteousness of God by faith in Jesus" is accounted, or imputed, to all believers without exception: yea, it is "put on them" as a robe: for the words "unto all and upon all," seem incapable of any other consistent construction. (Marg. Ref. d—f. Notes, 4:4—8. Is. 45:23—25. Jer. 23:5,6. Dan. 9: 24. 1 Cor. 1:26—31. 2 Cor. 5:18—21, v. 21. Gal. 3:26—29. Phil. 3:8—11, vv. 8,9. 2 Pet. 1:1,2.) Nor is there, in this respect, any difference between one man and another, however otherwise distinguished; as "all have sinned, and come short" of rendering to God the glory due unto him, all have lost his glorious image, and all have forfeited that glorious felicity, which was annexed to perfect obedience as its reward. (Marg. Ref. g—k. Notes, 5:1,2. Ps. 73:23—28, v. 24. 1 Pet. 5:10,11.) Therefore, whatever the nature or degree of men's crimes may have been, or whatever their nation, rank, or capacities, "there is no difference," as to the way in which they must be justified before God. Every believer is not only pardoned, but honourably acquitted, as one against whom no charge can be supported; and "accounted righteous," or entitled to the reward of righteousness. (Notes, 4:6—8. 8:32—34.) This is by the free gift of God, which he bestows on the believer, wholly from his own infinite grace and mercy; not only without his deserving it, but directly contrary to his deserts, which the apparent tautology, "freely, by his grace," seems to denote. This grace is honourably exercised, "through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ," or through the ransom and meritorious obedience unto death, of the incarnate son of God, as our Surety: for God the Father had before set him forth to be a propitiatory sacrifice; he had appointed him to be Mediator, as "God manifested in the flesh," for that purpose; he had openly "laid on him the iniquities of us all," and exacted the punishment from him; and he had exhibited this transaction to the world by the gospel, that through him sinners of every nation might approach God, "as a propitiatory, or mercy-seat, and find acceptance by faith in the Saviour's atoning blood. (Marg. Ref. l—o.) This method was taken, in order "to declare" and manifest the perfect righteousness of God; even in the very act of pardoning the innumerable sins of believers, remitting the punishment due to them, and accounting those righteous who in themselves were not so. Indeed, whatever the Jews might suppose, this was as necessary in respect of their believing progenitors, as any other sinners. For, in remitting the punishment, justly merited by the sins committed in times past "through his forbearance," God was not propitiated in any degree by the repentance or subsequent good works of his servants, which could not satisfy his justice; nor did he ultimately regard the legal sacrifices, which "could not take away sin:" but he had dealt with them as looking forward to the engagements of the divine Surety of the new covenant, and the atonement which he was at length to make. In the fulness of time, therefore, this sacrifice was offered, this righteousness introduced, and this method of justification published to mankind: that God might be clearly known to be a just and righteous Governor, and yet "the Justifier" of every one "who believed in Jesus;" which he could not otherwise have been. (Marg. Ref. p—r. Notes, Prov. 17:15. 24:24,25.) For justice in a governor requires, that every man be dealt with according to his real character and actions; except some expedient can be adopted for maintaining the authority of the law, and the credit of the administration: and to indemnify individuals, while mercy is exercised to those who deserve punishment. So that ancient believers had been admitted to the reward of righteousness, as well as exempted from the punishment deserved by their sins, for the sake of that promised Redeemer, who had engaged to pay their ransom, and bring in an infinitely valuable and everlasting righteousness for their justification: nor would it otherwise have consisted with the infinite justice of God to have dealt with them in a manner, so very different from their real deservings, nay, contrary to them. (Notes, Heb. 11:1—16,39,40.) This is evidently the apostle's argument; and the concluding verses might be thus translated: "Whom God hath before appointed to be a propitiation, through faith in his blood, for a demonstration of his justice, on account of the passing by of sins that had been committed in former times, through the forbearance of God: I say, for a demonstration of his justice, in this present time, in order that he might be just, and the Justifier of him that believeth in Jesus."—'Dr. Hammond saith the word δικαιος is here to be rendered clement and merciful, and that it is commonly taken in that notion, and seldom in that of vindictive justice; but in opposition to this I assert, that the word δικαιος is used about eighty times in the New Testament, and not once in that sense of clemency and mercy.... He himself produces but one place. (Matt. 1:19.) where, says Dr. Lightfoot, men torment the word δικαιος to make it signify clement and merciful, when it bears clearly the ordinary sense. Joseph being a just man, would not cohabit with an adulteress: and yet not being willing to make her a public example, and no necessity ... lying upon him so to do, he was minded to put her away privily.... That he might appear to be just, in requiring this satisfaction for our sins.' Whitby.—Too strong a protest cannot be entered, against this practice of giving a new meaning to words, in Scripture, in order to get rid of a conclusion, against which the writer happens to be prejudiced: it is absolutely adding to, or taking from, or changing the word of God; (Note, Rev. 22:18—21.) and it perplexes the minds of ordinary readers to such a degree, that the plainest passages seem to them obscure, and of doubtful meaning.

they for glorying, seeing even their pious ancestors had been justified by grace, through faith, for the sake of the promised Redeemer and his propitiation? And the apostle decides, that all boasting by any of the human race is excluded, and can have no admission, in consistency with truth and justice. It was indeed the avowed purpose of God, that boasting should be shut out, as the rival of his glory: but "by what law," or rule of judgment, could this be effected? Was it to be done by "the law of works," or the method of justifying men on the condition of their own obedience? This could never answer the end, if it were practicable for any to be thus justified; nay, this would introduce and sanction the boasting of one over another, in the things of God. Boasting must therefore be excluded, "by the law of faith:" not by a remedial law, as some call it, (which in fact is "a law of works," and introduces boasting:) but by justifying believers entirely by the grace of God through the righteousness and redemption of Christ, without any respect to their works, by faith alone of his own gift and operation; (Marg. Ref. s—u. Notes, 1 Cor. 1:26—31. Eph. 2:4—10.) not considered, in this matter, as an act of obedience, or a good work, or as the principle of subsequent obedience; (Notes, Gal. 5:1—6.) but as forming the relation between Christ and the sinner; which renders it proper that the believer should be pardoned and justified for the sake of the Saviour; and that the unbeliever, who is not thus united or related to him, should remain under condemnation. This is "the law of faith," or the rule of the divine conduct towards believers and unbelievers; and as God has determined, that "no flesh shall glory in his presence;" so on this ground also, the apostle concluded, that "a man is justified by faith, and not by the deeds of the law." (Marg. Ref. u, x. Notes, Mark 16:14—16. John 1:10—13. 3: 27—36, vv. 35,36. 1 John 5:11,12.)—By what law? (27) 'Or, "by what doctrine:" as the Hebrew word Torah is sometimes used for the doctrine which any one prescribes.' Beza. Torah is indeed used with great latitude; even much greater than the word νομος, law, is in the New Testament. V. 29—31. Could any man suppose that the great Creator of all was the God of the Jews only? Was he not also the God of the Gentiles? Being the Proprietor, Governor, and Benefactor of the whole earth; when all men had alike apostatized from him, it was meet, that in revealing a way for their recovery and reconciliation, he should suit it to the general case of all the nations; though special reasons might require a temporary restriction of it: for his object would be to receive worship from his creatures, in different parts of the world, and to become their Father and Portion. (Marg. Ref. y.) In fact, he was "the God of the Gentiles," as well as of the Jews; nor were even external privileges to be restricted to the Jews any longer: seeing the same One, living, and true God, who had formerly justified, and did at that time justify those of the circumcision who believed, by faith, and not by their legal services, and left unbelievers under condemnation; was ready with equal regard, to justify uncircumcised Gentiles, through faith in Christ, when they were brought thus to receive him. (Marg. Ref. z. Note, Gal. 2:11—16.) And if any should object, that this doctrine of "faith made void the law," as if it had been given in vain; the apostle absolutely denied the charge, and would by no means have a thought of this kind to be allowed of. On the contrary, he strongly maintains, that this fully "establishes the law" in all its honour and authority; neither abrogating it, nor disgracing it, nor altering it to a nearer level with man's present state and abilities. (Note, Ps. 119:126.)—The doctrine of faith indeed honours and fulfils the ceremonial law; and showed the proper intent of it, and of the legal dispensation: but then, this was only in order to the final abrogation of them. But the moral law was fully established in honour and authority, both in respect of its precepts and sanction by the perfect obedience and propitiatory sufferings of the incarnate Son of God: so that its immutable obligation, excellency, and equity, could not have been so fully shown, either by the perfect obedience of the whole human species, or by the destruction of every transgressor. Nor is any man justified by faith in Christ, who does not condemn himself, as justly deserving the wrath of God, for breaking his holy law. Moreover, it is given into the hands of every believer, as his rule of grateful obedience, by which he is to regulate his temper and conduct, and examine all his actions; that in every thing, in which he deviates from this perfect standard, he may repent, and seek forgiveness through the blood of Christ. Yea, it is written in his heart, by the regeneration of the Holy Spirit; (Notes, Jer. 31:31—34. Heb. 8:7—13.) and the believer's love to it, and delight in obeying it, are the evidences of his justification. (Notes, Jam. 2:14—26.) So that the doctrine of faith in every way magnifies and establishes the just, holy, good, and spiritual law of God, in all its honour and authority; while all other schemes of justification disgrace it, or weaken its authority and obligation, as if its precepts were unreasonably strict, and its penalty unrighteously severe; so that God would not be just, if he dealt with men according to it. We therefore know what the apostle's doctrine was: because we know what doctrine is objected to, as "making void the law;" what doctrine is perverted by hypocrites and antinomians, as loosening man's obligation to holy practice; and what doctrine, when duly understood and truly believed, "establishes the law" in the completest manner, and gives the most efficacious motives to all holy obedience.

Do we make void. (31) Καταργουμεν. See on 3.—We establish.] 'Ιστωμεν. 10:3. 11:20. 14:4. 2 Cor. 13:1. Jude 24.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. We ought always to distinguish between our advantages, and our deservings, and between the means of becoming accepted and holy, and that grace which teaches to profit by those means.—It is a favour of inestimable value to have "the oracles of God" transmitted to us: yet numbers who are thus distinguished, continue in unbelief to their deeper condemnation. (Notes, Luke 12:47,48. John 3:19—21.)—As the promises of God are made to believers alone, the unbelief of some or many professed Christians cannot make "the faithfulness of God of none effect:" for he will fulfil his promises to his people, and execute his threatened vengeance on hypocrites and apostates. But, while pride and enmity "charge God foolishly," humble faith says, "God forbid! let God be true and every man a liar:" and the believer will give him credit for his truth and justice, even where his dispensations are enveloped in clouds and darkness. Indeed, the humble Christian readily decides against every man's pretensions or opinions, when they reflect on the veracity, or militate against the word, of God: knowing that every man is fallible, deceitful, and unholy; but that the Lord can neither mistake, nor deceive, nor be deceived; and that he will be justified from every charge, and will overcome in every contest, or controversy, which his rebellious creatures may presume to enter into with him.—The nature and desert of sin, and the motives and purposes of the sinner, remain precisely the same; when the only wise God has taken occasion from them to manifest more conspicuously his own glory: and his justice also will be glorified in punishing the transgressors.—It has often been "slanderously reported" of Christians, that they say, "Let us do evil, that good may come," and "Let us sin on, that grace may be glorified:" but, if we be true believers, we know that duty belongs to us, and events to God: and that we must not commit any sin, or speak one falsehood, on the hope, or even the assurance, that God would glorify himself by means of it. But, if any habitually speak and act in another manner, without all doubt "their damnation will be just;" and those who love the truth of the gospel, should be extremely careful to avoid all appearances, which may give plausibility to such disgraceful slanders against our holy religion.

V. 9—20. Let us remember, that many and great as our advantages are, we are no better in the sight of God than benighted heathens, if not worse; except grace have made us to differ; and then to grace the whole praise is due: for it is proved, beyond contradiction, that we are all, in ourselves, "under sin." (Notes, Eph. 2:1,2. Tit. 3:4—7.)—The Scriptures adduced in these verses, too exactly describe the bulk of nominal Christians: their want of conformity to the law of God, and of understanding in the great concerns of religion, and their indisposition to seek with earnestness and decision after his favour and image: their unprofitableness, and working of mischief, instead of doing good: their filthy, profane, dissembling, slanderous, boasting, and flattering words; their oaths, perjuries, curses, and bitter revilings; their revenge, murders, duels, fightings, and delight in war: their mischievous and destructive courses, and their ignorance of the way of peace and holiness, too evidently prove, that "there is no fear of God before their eyes." So that he, who examines the state of society, even in this Christian country; nay, he who inquires seriously into the disposition of his own heart, and the tenor of his past and present life, comparing them with the holy law of God; will easily perceive, that "all mouth, and "every mouth must be stopped, and all the world must be brought in guilty before God." How plain then is it

CHAPTER IV.

Justification by faith proved, from the example of Abraham; and the words of David, 1—8. Abraham was justified before circumcision, (which was "the seal of the righteousness of faith,") that he might be the father of all believers, whether circumcised or not, 9—12. The promise was not given to him through the law, else it had been void; but, being "of faith by grace," it is sure to all his spiritual seed, in every age and nation, 13—17. The nature and strength of that faith, by which he was justified, 18—22. This was recorded, not for his sake only, but to show that all who believe in Christ, as crucified and risen, are justified in like manner, 23—25.

WHAT [a]shall we then say that [b]Abraham, our father [c]as pertaining to the flesh, hath found?

2 For if Abraham [d]were justified by works, [e]he hath whereof to glory, [f]but not before God.

3 For [g]what saith the Scripture? [h]Abraham believed God, and it was [i]counted unto him for righteousness.

4 Now [k]to him that worketh, is the reward not reckoned of grace, but of debt.

5 But [l]to him that worketh not, but [m]believeth on him that justifieth [n]the ungodly, [o]his faith is counted for righteousness.

to common sense, that "by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified before God!"

V. 21—31. Blessed be the Lord, that he has not left our fallen race "shut up under sin," without hope or help. For "now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested;" and those alone are truly wise, who plead guilty at his mercy-seat; and seek "that righteousness of God by faith in Jesus Christ, which is unto all and upon all that believe," without any difference. Proud men will be offended at this, and strive to establish some distinction between themselves and more scandalous or vulgar sinners: but they labour in vain; for "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God;" and the meanest and most guilty of the human species, who comes in God's appointed and manifested way, shall be "justified freely by his grace through the redemption" of his Son: while all, who persist in the attempt of justifying themselves, will assuredly perish under the wrath of God. (Note, 10:1—4.) This is a plan equally suited to glorify the justice, holiness, and mercy of our God; and to give encouragement to the broken-hearted self-condemned criminal. Thus all they, who of old "obtained a good report," found righteousness and salvation: thus the believer's felicity is secured, "boasting is excluded," despair obviated, and the Lord shown to be the God of all nations, with equal regard; making no other distinction in his final decision, than that which subsists between believers and unbelievers. And, whatever Pharisees, Sadducees, or infidels may object; whatever Antinomians, or Enthusiasts may plead, or profess; the doctrine of faith establishes the law in its real honour, and lays the true foundation for all holy obedience; and this doctrine alone, "establishes the law."

NOTES.—CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. The apostle had generally stated, that the mercy shown to believers of old was vouchsafed with reference to the righteousness and redemption of Christ; (Note, 3:21—26, vv. 25,26.) but he here proceeds to show this more especially, in respect of Abraham, the most renowned progenitor of Israel.—'From this single example of Abraham, as deservedly selected from among all the fathers, the apostle intended to draw a conclusion, which would necessarily take in all believers. And that he might do this fairly, he intimates, at the very entrance of the question, that he did not propose Abraham merely as one of the number of believers, but as the father of the church; that he might properly reason from the father to his children, the foundation of which he lays in the thirteenth verse.... In whatever way Abraham, the father of believers was justified, in the same must all his children (that is, all believers) be justified: but Abraham was not justified, and made the father of the faithful, by any of his own works, either preceding or following his faith in Christ, as promised to him; but merely by faith in Christ, or the merit of Christ by faith imputed to him for righteousness. Therefore all his children become his children, and are justified, not by their works, either preceding or following their faith; but by faith alone in the same Christ, who was at length to come;... and thus they are at present justified, and shall be to the end of the world.' Beza.—The original seems to connect the words, "according to the flesh," with the verb "found." "What shall we say, that Abraham, our father, hath found according to the flesh?" and some would explain it exclusively of his circumcision. 'By virtue of his obedience to God's command, in circumcising his foreskin. (1 Cor. 10:18.... 2 Cor. 5:16.... 11:18.... Phil. 3:3,4.)—In this the Jews had the greatest confidence of being acceptable to God,... declaring that no circumcised Jews go to hell.' Whitby.—The apostle had doubtless respect to these arrogant prejudices of his countrymen, in this argument: but if circumcision exclusively had been intended; he would scarcely have allowed, that Abraham might have had whereof to glory, if he had been justified by his obedience in that single instance, and not by his faith. It may therefore be concluded, that all those formal and proud works, however distinguished, by which men "born of the flesh," but not "of the Spirit," in every age, seek justification before God, were intended by the words "according to the flesh." (Marg. Ref. a—f. Notes, John 3:6. 2 Cor. 11:16—23. Phil. 3:1—7. 1 Pet. 2:23—25.) Did Abraham find righteousness, or justification, in this way? Surely not: why then should any man, who allows this, seek to be justified by such works?—As all really good works are "the fruits of the Spirit," and none else are called "good works" in Scripture, at least in the New Testament: and as it is especially the office of the Holy Spirit to convince men of sin, and to glorify Christ: it may be indisputably inferred, that "the fruits of the Spirit" are never expressly and allowedly depended on for justification. (Notes, John 16:8—11. Gal. 5:1—6,22—26. Eph. 2:4—10.)—Yet even the proposition, 'Good works are the fruits of faith, and follow after faith,' in Christ; though a general truth, may admit of some exception, in such cases as that of Cornelius. (Notes, Acts 10:1,2)—'This interrogation, being not formally answered, must be taken as an answer to itself: "What do we say? that Abraham found according to the flesh?" No, certainly he did not.' Hammond.—No Jew would deny, that Abraham was at least one of the most eminent servants of God, mentioned in Scripture: if therefore any of them had been justified by works, it might be supposed that he belonged to that company. And if this had indeed been the case, he would have had some ground of glorying above others, which was contrary to the doctrine before taught: (Note, 3:27,28.) but, in fact, however distinguished he had been in various respects, he had really nothing to boast of in the presence of God, being a sinner saved by grace, through faith, even as other men. For, not to argue from the years which had preceded his calling, the original source of his being made to differ from his former neighbours, or the failures in his subsequent obedience, and even in his faith; (Notes, Gen. 12:11—16. 20:1—6,9—13. Josh. 24:2.) it was evident from express Scripture, that "he believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness." (Marg. Ref. g—i. Note, Gen. 15:5,6.) The promise of God, his perfections as engaged to perform it, and the promised Seed through whom the blessings were bestowed, were the objects of his faith: this formed his relation to the Messiah, and interested him in the righteousness which the Messiah had engaged to perform; and therefore his faith was imputed to him for righteousness, as he thus received, and was made partaker of that "righteousness of God, which is, by faith of Jesus Christ, unto all and upon all that believe:" (Note, 3:21—26, v. 22.) so that he was accepted, and dealt with, as if he had personally satisfied divine justice, and perfectly answered all the demand's of God's holy law. But, if Abraham, though highly distinguished among men, had no ground of glorying before God; much less had his posterity any ground of glorying in him as their father, while they refused to walk in his steps.—Thus the apostle, by this single example, struck at the very root of their national vain confidence, in Abraham as their father, in circumcision, and in the law of Moses. (Notes, Gal. 3:6—14. Heb. 11:11—19. Jam. 2:21—24.)—Abraham believed, &c. (3) The quotation is from the LXX, Gen. 15:6.

V. 4, 5. From the example of Abraham, the apostle observed, that "to him" (if there were any such among men) who "worked" the full measure required by the law, the reward must be adjudged, as a debt due to him by the terms of that covenant: (Marg. Ref. k. Note, Luke 10:25—29.) whereas it was obvious, that it was adjudged to Abraham of grace, as unmerited, seeing "his faith was imputed to him for righteousness:" and this was the universal case of believers. For "to him who worketh not, but," conscious that he can advance no claim of this kind to the desired reward, comes as a sinner, and "believeth on him who justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness." (Marg. Ref. l—n.) This imputation of faith is not because of its own excellency, or worthiness as a good work; but as it refers the Sovereign Judge for payment to the accepted righteousness and atonement of his Son: even as the receipt of a scrap of paper, intrinsically not worth a farthing, in the form of a draft upon a creditable banker, is entered in the merchant's book, for a considerable sum of money, as if it had been paid in cash. The man, "who worketh not," will indeed diligently use appointed means of grace, earnestly and perseveringly repent, forsake sin with decision, and conscientiously perform his

6 Even as David also describeth [p]the blessedness of the man unto whom [q]God imputeth righteousness [r]without works,

7 Saying, [s]Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered.

8 Blessed is the man [t]to whom the Lord will not impute sin. [Practical Observations.]

9 Cometh [u]this blessedness then upon the circumcision only, or upon the uncircumcision also? [x]for we say that faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness.

10 How was it then reckoned? when he was in circumcision, or in uncircumcision? [y]Not in circumcision, but in uncircumcision.

11 And he received [z]the sign of circumcision, [a]a seal of the [b]righteousness of the faith which he had yet being uncircumcised: that he might be [c]the father of all them that believe, though they be not circumcised, [d]that righteousness might be imputed unto them also;

12 And the father of circumcision [e]to them who are not of the circumcision only, but who also walk [f]in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham, which he had being yet uncircumcised.

13 For [g]the promise that he should be the heir of the world was not to Abraham, or to his seed, [h]through the law, [i]but through the righteousness of faith.

several duties, and even become "zealous of good works:" yet he "worketh not" at all, with an aim or expectation of obtaining righteousness in this way, which he knows to be absolutely impossible. He comes to God, as "the Justifier of the ungodly," that he may obtain "the gift of righteousness by faith" of free grace, through the merits of the divine Surety. He is not indeed absolutely "ungodly" at the time of his justification; for his humiliation, submission, and faith, are effects of regeneration; which is the source of all "godliness" in a fallen creature. Yet he is justified, as "ungodly" in himself, in strict justice, and according to the law: he comes for the blessing as "ungodly:" God makes no account of any thing in justifying him, except his faith as forming his relation to Christ; and the man has no respect to any thing else himself, in expecting that blessing. Nay, the justified believer, whatever his holiness or diligence may be, never works for this purpose; and he still comes before God as "ungodly," in this respect, still depending on "the righteousness of God by faith in Christ," as his only hope; though his good works are evidences of the sincerity of his faith. (Note, Phil. 3:8—11.)—Abraham several years before, "by faith, obeyed" the call and command of God; and therefore could not be, strictly speaking, altogether "ungodly," when it was said, "He believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness:" so that the example of Abraham is a full and clear refutation of the construction, which some put on this text, that men are, altogether and in every sense, ungodly and unregenerate, at the time when God justifies them; a most obnoxious sentiment and of most dangerous tendency. (Note, Heb. 11:8—10.)—'"He that worketh," that is, who hath deserved any thing by his work, to whom is opposed "he that worketh not;" that is, who brings no work, for which he claims a reward; but depends on the gratuitous promise of God. But this indeed is spoken, by concession, in a similitude taken from the commerce and contracts of men: for otherwise, "who hath first given? and it shall be rendered to him again."' Beza. (Notes, 11:1—6, vv. 5,6,33—36.)

V. 6—8. In like manner, David, speaking of those among men who were peculiarly happy, did not mention or intimate any thing concerning those who had never sinned, or such as had done works to cover their sins and to justify themselves: but he "described the blessedness of the man to whom God imputeth righteousness without works," when he said, "Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven," and "whose sins are covered." (Marg. Ref. p—s. Note, Ps. 32:1,2.) Not that forgiveness of sins is equivalent to justification: for this implies also treating a man as righteous, and entitled to the reward of eternal life: as it is evident, in all human transactions, that the pardon of a criminal is very distinct from giving him the title to an estate. But God always imputes righteousness, where he does not impute sin: for none are pardoned, except in virtue of their relation to Christ by faith; and if his atoning blood cover their sins, his righteousness also justifies their persons. (Note, 2 Cor. 5:18—21, v. 21.) As their Surety, he suffered for their sins, which were imputed to him; and they are rewarded and made heirs of eternal life, because his righteousness is imputed to them. 'From hence the expression of blotting out iniquity, so frequently used in Scripture, may be understood; that is, the striking it out of the account.' Locke.—It should be remembered, that the inspired apostle, under a clearer dispensation, expounds the words of the prophet; not the prophet the words of the apostle. We must therefore understand David, according to St. Paul's interpretation; and not the reverse. If St. Paul meant forgiveness exclusively; why should he add the clause, imputeth righteousness without works?" (Note, 9—12.)—Blessed, &c. (7,8) Exactly from the LXX, Ps. 32:1,2.

V. 9—12. The Jews not only supposed that righteousness was by works, but that the privileges of God's people were inseparably connected with circumcision: the apostle therefore next inquired, whether "the blessedness," of which he was speaking, was vouchsafed to circumcised persons exclusively, or to the uncircumcised also? This might be readily decided by the case of Abraham. At what time "was faith imputed to him for righteousness?" The answer was undeniable; for it appeared, from the Scripture before cited, that he was justified at least fourteen years before he was circumcised; the former having been some time before Ishmael's birth, the other when Ishmael was thirteen years of age. (Notes, Gen. 15:5,6. 16:1—3. 17:23—27.) It was therefore manifest, that circumcision was not necessary in order to justification: and indeed Abraham received from God circumcision, to be an outward sign of the grace given him, and "a seal of the righteousness of faith" imputed to him, when he was in uncircumcision. (Marg. Ref. y—b. Notes, Gen. 17:9—13.) This language fully proves that circumcision sealed spiritual blessings to Abraham personally, as the outward seal of the covenant of grace, and the emblem of sanctification, however it might otherwise be applied or misunderstood. 'This seems an incontestable proof, that circumcision was the seal of the covenant of grace, and not merely of temporal promises; and consequently obviates the most considerable objection, that hath ever been urged against infant baptism.' Doddridge. (Notes, Heb. 6:13—20.) This seal was also a pledge to Abraham, of the performance of the promise respecting his seed, especially his spiritual seed or true believers. (Note, 1—3.) It is manifest, that he was justified before he was circumcised: and this was expressly ordered, for this end, "that he might be the father of all" those believers, who should have the circumcision of the heart, but not the circumcision of the flesh, that they might inherit all his blessings; especially "that righteousness should be imputed to them" also: (Notes, Gal. 3:6—14,26—29.) and he was afterwards circumcised, "that he might be the father of the circumcision also;" not merely the natural progenitor of the nation of Israel, but the spiritual father of all believers among them, who walked after the example of his obedient faith, which he had before circumcision, but most of them subsequent to it; that it might be to them "the seal of the righteousness of faith;" though not to those, who had only the outward sign, without the inward grace signified by it. V. 13. "The world" cannot here mean the land of Canaan, which is never so called: but "in Abraham and his Seed all the nations of the earth are blessed." (Notes, Gen. 12:1—3 v. 3. Gal. 3:15—18.) Abraham was the root and specimen of all that multitude all over the earth, on whom the most valuable blessings would be conferred, and who may be said to be "heirs of the world." He was, as it were, the repository, in whom all these blessings were first laid up for their advantage; and also the progenitor of Christ, "the King of kings and Lord of lords," and "Heir of all things." (Marg. Ref. Notes, 1 Cor. 3:18—23. Heb. 1:5—7. Rev. 5:8—10 11:15—18. 19:11—16.) This distinction was not given to Abraham through the law, for that was not promulgated till long after; nor to his posterity as under the law, for multitudes of them would be excluded for their sins, especially for unbelief: but it was given to him, through "the righteousness of faith," and they were the true seed, who partook of that same distinction.

V. 14—17. The apostle further argued, that if all they, and they only, who were under the law, were heirs: "faith," which the Scripture assigned as the immediate cause of Abraham's justification, would be made ineffectual. 'It is made void to them, who are not of the law, because then they cannot hy it be made heirs: and it is also made void to them that are of the law, because they were heirs before, and may still be so without it. (15)' Whitby. Indeed, whether the law of reason, or tradition, (under which Abraham was,) or the law of Moses, be considered; instead of giving any man an interest in the promises of God, it must necessarily expose him to condemnation. For the "law worketh wrath," by showing that every transgressor is exposed to the righteous indignation of God, and the clearer, the more copious, and the more express the law is, the more numerous, evident, and aggravated must his transgressions appear. If a man could possibly be without any law, he would not be arraigned and condemned as a criminal: for, as "sin is the transgression of law," no transgression could in that case be charged upon him, who is under no law. (Marg. Ref. k—n. Notes, 3:19,20. 5:20,21, v. 20.) But, as this cannot be the case of any, all men are liable to condemnation; (Note, 5:12—14.) for every man's rule "worketh wrath" against him for acting contrary to it; till he flees for refuge to Christ, who saves all believers from the condemnation of the law, though not from their obligation to obey it. (Notes, 3:9—26. Gal. 3:10—14,19—22.) As therefore God intended to give multitudes of transgressors a title to the promised blessings; so he appointed it to be "by faith, that it might be of grace" in order to ensure it to all the seed of Abraham, even to all who should ever be made partakers of "like precious faith with" him; not only to those who lived under the law of Moses, but to all others throughout the earth, and in every age of the world. This accorded to the promise, that "God had made Abraham the father of many nations." Several nations indeed naturally descended from him: (Note, Gen. 12:1—3.) yet this promise had a far nobler and more sublime accomplishment, in the immense multitudes from all nations, who have been, are, and hereafter shall be, made partakers in the blessings first conferred on him, in behalf of himself, and of all that should be accounted his children by a living faith. (Marg. Ref. o—r.) This was the case, before that God in whom Abraham believed as to the relation of the whole church to him: for God not only quickens the dead in sin, and so raises up children to Abraham from the nations which were dead in their idolatry and iniquity; but "he calleth those things which be not, as though they were;" and so had all the unnumbered millions of future believers, as it were, present before him, in respect of his foreknowledge and predetermination, when he made the promise to Abraham; and considered him as the father, and them as the family, to whom the inheritance of the blessings was ensured through faith. (Marg. Ref. s—u. Notes, 8:28—31. Matt. 3:7—10. Acts 15:13—18, v. 18. Gal. 3:26—29. Heb. 6:13—20.)—I have made, &c. (17) Exactly from the LXX, Gen. 17:5.

V. 18—22. The nature and energy of Abraham's faith are next stated. He believed the testimony of God, and expected the performance of his promise, when the case seemed hopeless, or "beyond hope;" and when there was nothing to oppose to the most formidable objections, and apparent impossibilities, but the sure testimony and faithful promise of God. He confidently hoped to become the father of many nations, naturally in his posterity, and spiritually through Christ, who was to descend from him; because God had said, that his seed should be innumerable as the stars of heaven. (Marg. Ref. x, y. Note, Gen. 15:5,6.) Yet many years had elapsed, since the same promise, for substance, was given; and he still continued without any child by Sarah, to whose offspring the promise was restricted. (Note, Gen. 15: 2,3.) She had been barren all her younger years, and was then become incapable of bearing children, according to the common course of nature; and Abraham was now grown old and unlikely to have any. (Notes, Gen. 17:5—8,17. 18: 9—12.) But though tried by such long delays, and discouraged by such immense difficulties, he did not weakly "stagger at the promise through unbelief;" he did not hesitate most confidently to expect, that God would be as good as his word: and being marvellously strengthened in faith, he gave glory to God, and honoured all his perfections, by a full assurance that he was able to perform what he had promised: and therefore "his faith was imputed to him for righteousness." That is, his faith was thus approved to be genuine, meet to form the relation between him and the predicted Redeemer and thus it marked him out as a proper person to be justified by the everlasting righteousness which the Messiah would introduce. (Marg. Ref. z—f. Notes, Gen. 17:17. Heb. 11:11,12.)—It is evident from the whole context, that Abraham's faith did not justify him, by its own merit or value, but as interesting him in Christ: for, though the sincerity of his faith was manifested on this occasion, he had actually been justified long before: and his example would not in any way aptly illustrate the Christian's justification by the righteousness of Christ, and not by that of his own faith, if we do not thus understand it.—A very common perversion of this passage must not pass unnoticed. Many speak of "hoping against hope;" not that God will fulfil his promises to believers, notwithstanding all difficulties and improbabilities; but that themselves are believers and shall be saved, contrary to the evidence of their tempers and lives: and this is often the grossest presumption and fanaticism imaginable, though sometimes in a measure countenanced by those who are not aware of its tendency.—So shall, &c. (18) From the LXX but it accords to the Hebrew. (Gen. 15:5.)

V. 23—25. The history of Abraham, and of his justification, "was not written for his sake alone," or merely to honour his memory: as he had been dead long before Moses recorded it: but it was intended for the instruction of mankind in all future generations; and of those especially to whom the gospel should be preached. If indeed they believed in that God, who had raised Jesus from the dead, and who was able to fulfil his largest promises, their faith would be "imputed

CHAPTER V.

They who are justified by faith, have peace with God, rejoice in hope, and rejoice and glory in tribulations, 1—5. The abundant love of God to them when sinners and enemies, in "reconciling them to himself by the death of his Son," assures them of final salvation, and excites them to rejoice and glory in him, 6—11. As sin and death come upon all men by Adam; so the grace of God, which justifieth unto life, with all concurrent blessings, comes more abundantly on all believers by Jesus Christ, 12—19. The law proved an occasion to the abounding of sin unto death; but this made way for the still greater abounding of grace, as "reigning through righteousness unto eternal life by Jesus Christ," 20, 21.

THEREFORE [a]being justified by faith [b]we have peace with God, [c]through our Lord Jesus Christ:

2 By [d]whom also we have access by faith into this grace [e]wherein we stand, [f]and rejoice in hope of [g]the glory of God.

3 And not only so, [h]but we glory in tribulations also: [i]knowing that tribulation worketh patience; to them for righteousness," even as that of Abraham had been: for this faith, if genuine, would form a relation between them and the Lord Jesus, and give them an interest in his righteousness, atonement, and intercession. For, as Jesus had been delivered up to death, by man as a criminal, but by the Father as a sacrifice for the offences of his people: so "he had been raised again for their justification." (Marg. Ref. Notes, 8:32—34. 1 Cor. 15:12—19. Heb. 13:20,21.) He was thus perfectly justified from the charges brought against him, and the acceptance of his righteousness and redemption was demonstrated: and in this all his people were interested; this justification of the Surety was eventually effectual for the justification of all those who were represented by him, to which privilege every one is actually admitted when he truly believes the testimony, and embraces and relies on the promises of God, according to the gospel. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

4 And [k]patience, experience; [l]and experience, hope:

5 And [m]hope maketh not ashamed; [n]because the love of God is [o]shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us.

V. 1—8. No mere man, since the fall of Adam, could ever "find" any thing but death by his own works; and the history contained in the Scriptures, with the confessions of the best of men, proves that all who have been saved, escaped condemnation and obtained heaven by "faith being imputed to them for righteousness."—In all controversies we should inquire, "What say the oracles of God?" These uniformly teach, that the reward is not assigned to a man for working, as a "debt;" but through believing, as "of grace." None can sincerely pray for this blessing, till he cease from working in order to justify himself: and indeed no man performs good works from pure principles, till he learns to believe "in him who justifieth the ungodly." Yet at the same time no true believer will neglect "working," in order to glorify God, to do good to men, and to make his own calling and election sure; because he delights in the commandments of God, and "hungers and thirsts after righteousness."—Man's felicity consists in the favour of God, which can belong to none of our fallen race, except the pardoned sinner: and the forgiveness of sin, and the imputation of "righteousness without works," are vouchsafed entirely through the obedience unto death of our gracious Redeemer. Those who obtain this "blessedness" are most happy, though poor, despised, and afflicted: all who come short of it are most miserable, however wealthy, honoured, and prospered. This distinction extends to all nations, sects, or forms of worship; some are justified, and some are not, in all countries where the great truths of the gospel are known: and this method of "justifying the ungodly" is equally suited to preclude the most eminent saints from glorying, and the most atrocious sinners from despairing.

V. 9—25. The seal of the Holy Spirit, in sanctification, is the inward evidence "of the righteousness of faith:" when the old nature is crucified, and the heart is circumcised to love God, it is evident that we are "the children of Abraham." and walk in his steps: and sacraments will in this case be really seals and pledges of the same blessing.—Blessed be God, that we are not left under the covenant of works. For the more holy and perfect the law, the greater wrath would in that case come upon us: but, as all is "of grace," it is "through faith;" and the promised blessing is insured to all the chosen seed, wherever dispersed, or however distinguished. May we then copy the example of Abraham; and, in the midst of perils and difficulties, "in hope believe beyond hope;" assured that God is both able and willing to perform his promises to all who trust in him; and waiting the accomplishment of them in patient obedience. Thus our faith will be "imputed to us for righteousness," through him "who died for our offences, and rose again for our justification:" and "because he lives, we shall live also, and live for ever." (Notes, 5:7—10. 8:32—39. John 14:18—20. Col. 3:1—4.)

NOTES.—CHAP. V. V. 1, 2. The apostle, having stated and confirmed his doctrine, concerning justification, here proceeds more fully to show "the blessedness" of those who are justified. (Note, 4:6—8.) When the sinner believes in Jesus, his "faith is imputed to him for righteousness:" thus he is justified before God, accounted a righteous person, and entitled to the reward of righteousness. (Marg. Ref. a. Note, 4: 23—25.) In consequence of this, "he has peace with God;" the controversy, or hostility, which sin had excited, is terminated by a blessed pacification, through the great Mediator; and a covenant of amity is ratified between that Holy God who had so just cause to treat his rebellious creature as an enemy, and that rebel who before was so unreasonably alienated from his beneficent Creator. (Marg. Ref. b, c. Notes, 7—10. 2 Cor. 5:18—21. Col. 1:18—23.) The sinner submits, pleads guilty, seeks mercy, and learns to love and serve God: and his offended Sovereign receives him to full favour, and thenceforth behaves to him as his Friend and Father. The believer, being thus reconciled, considers the cause and people of God as his own, and separates from his enemies, that he may be united to his friends: he makes the glory of his God the ultimate end of his habitual conduct: and God protects, countenances, provides for, and communes with him, as his friend: and requites the injuries or favours done to him, as if done to himself. (Notes, Gen. 12:1—3. Is. 41:8,9. John 15:12—16. Jam. 2:21—24.) All this centres in the Person, mediation, and grace, of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has made and preserves this blessed peace. Thus every true believer has actually found admission into a state of full favour with God, even as if he had never sinned: in this he "stands" accepted before God, and is secured by his promise and grace from being cast down from it: and he learns to rejoice and glory, in the prevailing, abiding, and realizing hope, of being glorified with God, and glorifying him; of completely bearing his glorious image, and of enjoying his unspeakable love to all eternity. (Marg. Ref. d—g. 3:23. Notes, 2:7—11. 8:14—17,28—31. Ps. 73:23—28. 2 Cor. 3:17, 18. 4:13—18. Rev. 21:22—27.) The expressions here used may also allude to the free access of sinners from different nations, into the full enjoyment of the privileges of God's people, without any respect to the legal ceremonies and restrictions, in approaching his mercy-seat.

(Notes, Ps. 44:8. Is. 45:23—25. Jer. 9:23, 24. 1 Cor. 1:26—31. Gal. 6:11—14.) "Boasting," or glorying, in ourselves is excluded: that, by the free grace of God, we may glory and exult in the hope of heavenly felicity, even during our heaviest trials and in Christ Jesus, and in God as our God and Portion.

V. 3—5. The primitive Christians rejoiced, or exulted, "in hope of the glory of God," not only notwithstanding present afflictions, but they even "gloried" in the tribulations themselves, as the sure pledges of the divine favour, and as means of spiritual improvement. (Marg. Ref. b. Notes, 2 Cor. 4:13—18. 12:7—10.) For they were assured, from the word of God and from the evidence of facts, that their trials and persecutions produced submission to the divine will, and acquiescence in it, meekness amidst injuries and provocations, "patient continuance in well-doing," and quietly waiting for the Lord in all difficulties, perils, and sufferings. (Marg. Ref. i—l. Notes, Jam. 1:2—4. 1 Pet. 4:12—16.) Their trials indeed might at first excite impatience; but by watching and praying, they would overcome it: and thus they were wrought into a patience of spirit through trials: as the rough block is wrought into a beautiful statue, by the chisel and labour of the statuary. At the same time this patience produced an enlarged experience; an experimental acquaintance with their own weakness and sinfulness, in order to their humiliation; of the reality and power of grace in their hearts, after repeated trials in the furnace; (Note, 1 Pet. 1:6,7.) of the faithfulness of God to his promises; and o his readiness to answer their prayers. So that these painfu dispensations conduced still further to establish "the hope of glory;" and to assure them, that this hope would never make them ashamed, by vanishing in disappointment; like the baseless confidence of a worldly man, of a Pharisee, an unbelieving Jew, an enthusiast, an antinomian, or a hypocrite. For the hope of the tried and experienced believer is not only warranted by the word of God, but "sealed" upon his heart by the gift of the Holy Spirit; through whose sacred influences the excellency and loving-kindness of God, especially in the work of redemption, are so discovered to him, and poured out through all the faculties of his soul, as to produce a similarity of disposition, a reciprocal love of the divine perfections, a longing desire of the favour of God, a delight in communing with him and serving him, a lively gratitude for his benefits, and zeal for his glory: these being both full proofs of regeneration, the inward "seal of the righteousness of faith;" and earnests of heavenly felicity, ensure the Christian's hope from the shame of disappointment. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Notes, Is. 45:15—17. 1 Pet. 4:12—16.) Many, both writers and preachers, interpret this clause ("the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts,") almost exclusively of the perception and sense of the love of God to us, which is vouchsafed by the Holy Spirit. Yet our love to God as "the fruit of the Spirit," writing his law in our hearts, is in fact, the only indisputable proof that our hope will never make us ashamed. The seal and consolations of the Spirit are distinguished from all enthusiastical delusions and false affections, by their permanently sanctifying effects: (Notes, 2 Cor. 1:21,22. Eph. 1:13,14. 4:30—32.) no supposed sense of God's love to us, except as attended with the consciousness of loving him, can warrant a scriptural assurance; and the Spirit of adoption is doubtless a Spirit of love to God, as well as confidence in him. (Notes, 8:14—17,28—31. 1 John 4:19.) It must therefore be evident, that the work of the Holy Spirit, in changing our natural enmity against God into supreme love of him, must be intended, either as the primary meaning of the clause, or as the inseparable effect of a genuine sense and perception of the love of God to us.—It cannot be supposed, that the apostle mentioned this triumphant confidence as the habitual attainment of all justified persons, but rather as an invaluable privilege, consequent on justification; which must be sought with diligence and earnestness, and actually enjoyed nearly in proportion as it is thus sought.—The sufferings of believers, especially from persecution, form a grand objection, to what is spoken in Scripture concerning their happiness, in the opinion of men in general. To select, therefore, these very trials, as a special ground of the Christian's glorying and rejoicing, was peculiarly suited to meet that objection and to produce a great effect on the reader's mind and heart. (Notes, Matt. 5:10—12. Luke 6:21—23. Acts 5: 41,42. 2 Cor. 4:13—18. 12:7—10. Phil. 1:27—30.)

V. 6. It might perhaps be objected to the words "hope maketh not ashamed," that after all, it was not impossible, nor even highly improbable, the believer's hope should terminate in disappointment and shame, through the prevalence of sinful propensities, and the power of temptation; and that Satan might, at length, induce him to apostatize. Some constitutional or habitual iniquity, which in more favourable circumstances had been kept under with great difficulty, might at length obtain the ascendency through unwatchfulness, and so destroy him; or he might fall away, in the hour of death, or at some other critical season. The apostle therefore digresses in order to obviate this objection: and at the same time shows what abundant reason believers have to love their God and Saviour; and to adore with admiring complacency the glory of his grace. When they, who are now "at peace with God," lay in the ruins of the fall, under deserved wrath, and the power of sin and Satan, "without strength" to resist their offended Sovereign, or to deliver themselves; when they had neither natural power for so arduous a work if they had been inclined to it; nor moral ability or inclination to attempt it: when thus impotent, and helpless, and dead in sin, they could have no refuge but in the mere compassion of God. They were also "ungodly," and without any proper disposition of heart towards him, nay, every way contrary to his nature, will, and worship; they were too proud even to ask for mercy or to allow their need of it, and too averse to true religion to be at all willing to become spiritual worshippers; yet even then "Christ died for them," in their stead, a sacrifice for their sins, and to make way for their salvation! Some of those indeed, for whom Christ died, had previously gone to heaven; others were godly persons then living on earth; and others had not come into existence: yet they were all considered as "without strength," and as "ungodly," in respect of Christ's dying for them. They all stood, as it were present before God, according to his omniscience, foreknowledge, and predetermination, in their natural state of impenitent ungodliness; as Adam, after his transgression: (Notes, Gen. 3:10—13.) and Christ, as their divine and righteous Surety, took their sins upon himself, and engaged to atone for them, before they knew their own lost condition, and without any solicitation from them. In this sense, he is "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." (Marg. Ref. Notes, 1 Pet. 1:17—21. Rev. 13:8—10.) The believers who lived before his coming, were not only pardoned and saved, through his engagement in their behalf; but their repentance, faith, and grace, as the effects of regeneration, sprang from the same source. (Note, 3:21—26.) At length, "in due time," the season appointed by the only wise God, above four thousand years subsequent to the fall of Adam, he appeared on earth, and "died for the ungodly;" and by his Spirit sinners were, and are, quickened from the death of sin, and so brought to repent, believe, love, and obey: but all blessings come to them, through his atonement and intercession. (Notes, Eph. 2:4—10. Tit. 3:4—7.)

V. 7—10. To illustrate the immensity of this love of God, the apostle shows, that if "a righteous man," one of strict integrity, who had committed no crime against the welfare of the community, were about to be put to death through the iniquity and oppression of unjust judges, or in any other way were in danger of losing his life; there would scarcely be found a person, who would consent to die in his stead: though perhaps for "a good man," one of extensive philanthropy, whose life had been and was likely to be a public blessing, some one might even venture to lay down his life. This has in a few cases been done on the field of battle; and perhaps it might be possible to find a man, who would, in such a cause, suffer for his friend, or benefactor, even upon a scaffold. Yet this most rare instance, the very summit of human affection, falls immensely beneath the love of God to us. (Marg. Ref. t—x.) He, who should give up his life in these circumstances, would do it for a person of superior excellency, or one who had greatly befriended him; and his death would ensure honour and applause to his memory. But the infinitely glorious God had "commended," or set off to the utmost advantage, "his love to us," in that his incarnate and coequal Son gave himself to endure the most agonizing and ignominious death, for those who were infinitely beneath him; for his creatures who had rebelled against him, and persisted in that ungrateful rebellion; yea, for impenitent sinners, many of whom had perpetrated the most atrocious and multiplied crimes to provoke his vengeance, and all of them rebels and ungrateful, whose state of heart rendered them the meet objects of his abhorrence! Yet, he had freely loved them, and purposed their salvation; and when his justice and holiness, and the honour of his law, obstructed that gracious design, he so loved them, that he gave his own Son to die a sacrifice for their sins! (Marg. Ref. y, z. P. O. Gen. 22:13—24. Notes, John 3:16. 15:12—16. 1 John 4:9—12.) Now if this were so, and they, by divine grace, had been brought to repent, and to believe in Christ; and had thus been justified through the shedding of his blood, by faith in that great atonement: "much more" would they be kept from falling again under the wrath of God and perishing in sin, through him who died for them and rose again. For could it be imagined that he, who so loved them, when enemies, as to die for them, would not save and uphold them by his almighty power, now they were made friends? If, when they were not only destitute of godliness, and impenitent transgressors; but enemies to the holy character, law, sovereignty, grace, providence, and cause of God, they had been brought into a state of reconciliation, and cordial peace with Him, by the death of his Son upon the cross; (Note, 1,2.) "much more" would they, being thus reconciled, be preserved from falling under the power of sin and Satan, or finally apostatizing, "by his life," his intercession, authority and omnipotent grace. (Marg. Ref. a—e. Notes, 8:32—39. John 10:26—31. 14:18—20. Col. 3:1—4.) He, who had done the greater work for them when enemies, would surely do that which was immensely less difficult for them as his friends and children; and the living Lord would complete the purpose of his dying love, by saving all believers to the uttermost till his finished ransom on the cross should terminate in their finished salvation, as "presented faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy."—There could be no danger of a reconciled believer falling under the wrath of God, except on the supposition of his committing sin, and dying without repentance; but had Christ suffered, and humbled himself even to death upon the cross, that he might bring him into this state of reconciliation? and would he, after all, so leave him to himself, and in the hands of the wicked one, as thus finally to perish, when his living power could prevent it, without any suffering or self-denial whatever?—Some expositors insert, 'If we be not wanting to ourselves.' But first, Is not this undeniably adding to the Scripture? (Note, Rev. 22:18—21, vv. 18,19.) And, secondly, Does not this inevitably lead us to trust in our own hearts, instead of trusting in God, to "hold us up that we may be safe?" V. 11. Having such a pledge of future and complete salvation, in the love of God through Christ, and in past mercies experienced; the apostle declared that he, and other established believers, not only rejoiced and exulted in the hope of heaven, and in their tribulations for Christ's sake: but they "glorified in God also," as their unchangeable Friend and all-sufficient Portion: but this was not by the works of the law, as the Jew made his boast in God; but "through our Lord Jesus Christ." For according to the law, they were all sinners and enemies, but by Christ they had now "received reconciliation." (Marg. and Marg. Ref. f, g.) This is the proper translation of the sentence, which refers to the whole of the pacification, between God and the believing sinner through the mediation of Christ: and not merely to the atonement, which is the ground of it.—In exactness of language, God receives the atonement; and believers, in consequence, "receive the reconciliation." As the apostle and his brethren were confident that the great Peacemaker, who had effected this reconciliation, "by the blood of his cross," and the power of his grace, would certainly preserve it; they gloried in God through him, as their God, and everlasting Portion.—To explain all this of the Gentiles exclusively, as some do, as if the Jews did not want a reconciliation, makes the apostle speak of himself as a Gentile; and indeed it is so unscriptural and so irrational; that one cannot but be astonished to find men of great learning and talents contend for it.

V. 12—14. In order more fully to illustrate the important subject, the apostle calls the reader's attention to the state of the whole human race, from the fall of Adam. He was the federal head, surety, and representative of all his posterity; nor did sin enter, save to the personal condemnation of Eve, till he also ate the forbidden fruit. (Note, Gen. 3:6.) By that "one man sin entered into the world," to pollute and ruin the whole human species; and so "death," spiritual and temporal, followed, and "passed upon all men, for that" (or, "in whom") "all had sinned." In Adam, as being in his loins when he thus apostatized, we all sinned and fell under condemnation; his blood was attainted for rebellion; and thence that evil nature originated, from which all our personal transgressions proceed. (Marg. Ref. h—k. Notes, Gen. 2:16,17. 3:17—19.) In proof of this our union with Adam, and our concern in his first transgression, which the proud heart of man is prone to deny, or object to, even with blasphemous enmity, it should be observed, that for two thousand five hundred years before the giving of the law, sin prevailed in the world, and was punished with death: but sin cannot be imputed, where no law is, of which it is a transgression. (Marg. Ref. l, m. Note, 4:14—17.) None of the immense multitudes, who died between the fall of Adam and the promulgation of the law, could personally violate the prohibition, to which the penalty of death had been originally annexed; yet they were included in the sentence denounced against Adam, and, after much toil and suffering, "returned to the dust whence they were taken." And, though adults might be thought to die for their personal violation of the law of tradition, or of their own reason and conscience; yet, during this long interval, an innumerable multitude had been subjected to death, who had never broken any law, "after the similitude of Adam's transgression;" that is, wilfully and deliberately. For the number of infants who had been cut off, with great pain and agony, previously to their commission of actual sin, had been immensely great. They were involved in the destruction of the whole world by the deluge, and in that of Sodom and Gomorrah; and according to the ordinary course of things, "death reigned over them," before they were capable of actual and wilful transgression. Nor could this fact be accounted for, consistently with the divine perfections; otherwise than by allowing that they, as one with Adam, had fallen in him under condemnation, through his violation of that covenant, in which he acted as surety for all his offspring. (Marg. Ref. n—p.) There may indeed be a comfortable hope, that as infants die in Adam, without their own personal transgressions, so they will be saved in Christ, without their own personal faith in him, as never living to be capable of it: yet that change must be wrought in them by the regenerating Spirit, which would have produced faith, had they lived longer. Indeed the sufferings and death of infants, in every age, forms an irrefragable proof of 'original sin:' but it was more peculiarly so from Adam to Moses; as that law was not then in being, which in some instances, entailed the guilt of the parents on their children, to the third and fourth generation. (Note, Ex. 20:5.) Yet these laws were deduced from the same principle of the oneness between the root and the branches; though only applied in some special cases, while that of Adam reached in general to all his posterity. For he was "a figure," or type, "of him who was to come," as the Surety of a new covenant, in behalf of all related to him. (Note, 1 Cor. 15:45—49.) In many respects Adam might be considered as the contrast of Christ; but he resembled him, and was his type, in the divine prescience, by acting as the surety of all related and united to him: for thus Christ acted as the Surety of all his people, who are one with him, and deemed his spiritual progeny: (Notes, Ps. 22:30,31. Is. 53:11,12.) and they are interested in his obedience, sufferings, victories, and exaltation.—'Adam is compared with Christ, both in what is similar, and what is contrary. They are alike in this; that each of them shares what he has with his: they are clearly unlike in this, that Adam by nature communicates sin unto death to his posterity; but Christ by grace communicates his righteousness to his people unto life.'—Beza. Many learned men explain what is said of "death," as meaning only mortality: but, do we not all derive a depraved, as well as a mortal, nature from Adam? And does not Christ save his people from guilt and depravity and eternal punishment, and not from mortality? And would immortality, without justification and sanctification, be a blessing? (Notes, John 5:28,29. 2 Tim. 1:10.) If we are depraved, or "dead in sin," and mortal as Adam's descendants; we must not only die, but be miserable and unholy for ever, without the salvation of Christ. (Notes, 6:21—23. Gen. 2:16,17.)—Death reigned. (14) "Sin reigned unto death." (Note, 20,21, v. 21.) What a grand, sublime, tremendous idea! Sin and death personified, as two united conquerors and tyrants reigning over all mankind; and, without mercy, consigning, by various tortures, their bodies to the grave, and their souls to hell!

V. 15—19. The principal thing which renders the expositions, generally given of these verses, perplexed and unsatisfactory, arises from an evident misconception of the apostle's reasoning, in supposing that Adam and Christ represented exactly the same company: whereas Adam was the surety of the whole human species as his posterity; Christ only of that chosen remnant, which has been, or shall be, one with him by faith, who alone "are counted to him for a generation." (Note, Ps. 22:30,31.) Indeed all men, in consequence of the undertaking of Christ, are under a dispensation of mercy, and are "endured with much long-suffering;" they are not left desperate, they have many temporal mercies, and they shall all arise to judgment. There is likewise such an infinite sufficiency in the atonement of Christ, and it is proposed to sinners in so general a manner, as a common salvation for all who will accept of it, that a foundation is laid for the most unreserved invitations, exhortations, and expostulations; and no one will be rejected, who sincerely seeks this salvation. Yet these important truths perfectly harmonize with the foreknowledge and predetermined purpose of God, in respect of the persons who actually will embrace and obtain the proffered blessings. If we omit the consideration of the number who perish in "the first Adam," or are saved in "the second Adam;" if we wholly leave this to the wise, righteous, and merciful Creator and Judge of all men, as one of those "secret things which belong to him," and not to us; and if we exclusively consider the benefits which believers derive from Christ, as compared with the loss sustained in Adam, by the human race; we shall then see the passage open, most perspicuously and gloriously, to our view. For the thoughts of the supposed immense majority of those, who shall eventually perish, is apt to incumber the mind in these contemplations: I say, supposed; for possibly we shall find our conjectures erroneous, when the doom of men, through all ages and nations, shall be finally determined. Let us then advert to the apostle's words.—"The offence" of Adam, and its consequences, do not in all things coincide with the "free gift," or the grace, of redemption. Through that one man's single offence, "the many," or the multitude, of mankind are dead; under condemnation, dead in sin, and exposed to death, temporal and eternal. But the infinite grace and mercy of God, and the free gift of righteousness and salvation, through that "one man Jesus Christ," "the second Adam," who is also "the Lord from heaven," much more abound to "the many," even to all the multitude of believers; by bringing them into a far safer, happier, and more exalted state, than that from which they fell in Adam. (Marg. Ref. q—t.) For this gift not merely answers to the loss sustained by Adam's sin, but far exceeds it in this respect: "the judgment of God" came through Adam's single offence, "upon all men to condemnation: but the free gift not only delivers believers from that "condemnation," but from the punishment due to their own numerous, or rather innumerable transgressions: nor does it place them anew in a state of probation, at all resembling that of Adam before he sinned; but it fixes them in a state of justification, even as Adam would have been, if he had stood his time of trial. For if, by "one offence of one man," death acquired a complete dominion over the whole human race, without a personal trial, in that respect, whether they would be obedient or not; much more will they, who by faith "receive the abundance of grace," and of the gift of "righteousness," be assuredly preserved in that state of acceptance, and so "reign in life" by the perfect obedience of their one Surety Jesus Christ; without the infinite peril, or inevitably fatal consequences, of being put upon a personal trial of their perfect obedience, like that in which Adam had failed, and in which Christ had persevered. (Marg. Ref. u—x.) Man is indeed, in some respects, in a probationary state on earth: but no man is put upon the trial, whether he can obtain exemption from the general condemnation of Adam and his seed, by his own personal obedience. A trial is made of him, tending to discover the wickedness of his heart by manifold experiments; the trial is made by the gospel, whether the sinner will repent and believe; professed Christians are tried, whether they are sincere or not; and believers are proved in respect of the strength of their faith and grace: yet they are not put upon any probation, with reference to their justification and eternal life; but "are accounted righteous," and appointed heirs by faith alone, through the righteousness of their One divine Surety; which consisted not, like Adam's offence, in one action, but in a continued and perfect conformity to the whole divine law, through life, and unto his death upon the cross.—Yet, notwithstanding these differences, the similarity is striking and instructive: for, "as by the one offence of one man, sin entered," and prevailed to the condemnation of all men; so, by "the righteousness of One," even Christ, grace entered and prevailed to the complete justification of all men, throughout the earth, and during all ages, who are related to Christ by grace and faith, or by regeneration, and partaking of the life-giving Spirit of Christ; as all men were related to Adam by natural generation. For, as "by the disobedience" of one single person, being a public character, or representative of his posterity, "many were made" or constituted "sinners," and dealt with accordingly, previously to the consideration of their personal transgressions: so, "by the obedience of One," who also was a public character, and the representative of his people, "many," even the whole multitude of believers, "are constituted righteous" before God, and dealt with as such; even previously to the consideration of their personal holiness and obedience; which spring from their spiritual union with Christ, as depravity does from man's natural union with Adam. (Marg. Ref. y—f.) Thus, in many things, the type and the Antitype coincide; though disobedience and condemnation are opposite to obedience and justification. But the believer, being justified by faith, has his title to life in Christ, who preserves it for him: so that he is not left to peradventures, or to the hazards arising from the mutability of creatures, as Adam was: but he is safe by his union with him, who is "God manifest in the flesh;" and his future felicity will be proportionably more exalted, in consequence of his endeared relation to the Godhead, in Christ his Brother and Friend. Much more, &c. (17) Can any thing be "much more" certain, than that all men as one with Adam die? Yes, it is much more certain that all who by faith "receive the abundance of grace and the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life with Christ." Enoch and Elijah did not die, but were translated; and multitudes innumerable shall be living when Christ shall come: (Note, 1 Cor. 15:50—54.) but not one true believer shall come short of "reigning in life with him!"—As it is evident, that all men, in the strict sense of the word, do not "receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness," or obtain "justification of life;" and that "all men," in this universal sense, shall not "reign in life," for some shall "go away into everlasting punishment:" so the term must be explained, in the first clause, of all men in Adam, and in the second of all men in Christ, if any consistent meaning is to be affixed to the words: (18) except universal "salvation with eternal glory," be contended for; as "justification unto life," and "reigning with Christ in life" are predicated emphatically of the whole company here described. It may, indeed, be admitted, that the "free gift" is sufficient for "all men," and ought to be proposed to "all men;" and if "all men" (18) be thus understood, as some think it may be, it differs from the "many" in some of the other verses: yet the apostle's argument seems, through the whole, to be concerning the same companies, those in Adam and those in Christ.

V. 20, 21. The whole plan, respecting justification, was fixed and carried into effect, long before the law was given by Moses. (Notes, 4: Heb. 11:1—19.)—This law, including the whole Mosaic dispensation, "entered" in accession to the preceding revelations among a few persons, compared with the whole posterity of Adam; and for a short time, compared with the duration of the world: i. e. among the sons of Jacob alone; and above two thousand five hundred years after the creation of the world. But, so far from being intended for the justification of those who received it, "it entered that the offence might abound." The moral law, by its perfection, showed that very many thoughts, affections, tempers, words, and actions were sinful, which otherwise would not have been known to be so. (Note, 3:19,20.) It evinced the malignity and desert of every sin; and it irritated man's natural corruption, both to hanker after forbidden objects, and to rise in opposition and enmity against its spiritual precepts, and its righteous sanction. (Note, 7:7—14.) Thus it occasioned transgressions to be multiplied, for it had no efficacy to cure human depravity: (Note, 8:3,4.) and at the same time it aggravated the enormity of sin, seeing it was committed so by [c]the righteousness of one, the free gift came upon [d]all men unto justification of life.

19 For [e]as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners; [f]so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous.

20 Moreover, [g]the law entered, that the offence might abound: [h]but where sin abounded, grace did much more abound; against so express a declaration of the divine will. Even the ceremonial law, as considered apart from Christ, multiplied duties, and consequently transgressions; as none perfectly kept it, and numbers constantly violated it. (Marg. Ref. g.) So that the law in every sense "entered," in order to show and condemn man's abounding wickedness, as an experiment tried with a part of the human race; that the free grace of redemption might be more gloriously displayed, by its superabounding, where sin had most abounded; and (like the waters of the deluge) flowing far above the summits of the highest mountains of man's guilt and depravity. (Marg. Ref. h. Notes, Gal. 2:17—21. 3:19—22.)—Therefore as "sin," like some terrific victor and tyrant, had "reigned" with uncontrolled sway, unto the death and ruin of all men, under Adam's covenant: (Note, 12—14.) even so "grace," or the infinitely free and rich mercy of God, might ascend a more exalted throne, and there reign with benign authority, through the righteousness of the Surety of the new covenant, unto the eternal life of all who believed; in virtue of the power and grace of the Lord Jesus Christ. (Marg. Ref. i—m.)—Grace reigns also in the believer's heart: but this is more explicitly treated on in the ensuing chapter; and grace as reigning upon the throne of God, to justify every believing sinner, however his past transgressions have been multiplied and aggravated, and to complete the salvation of every justified believer, is here specially intended. As "grace reigns unto eternal life" to those alone who are in Christ by faith; so these exclusively must be intended, in the whole contrast between the first and the second Adam.

21 That [i]as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might [k]grace reign [l]through righteousness [m]unto eternal life, by Jesus Christ our Lord.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. A most blessed change takes place in the sinner's state, however guilty and depraved he has been, when he becomes a true believer: "being justified by faith he hath peace with God," through "our Lord Jesus Christ;" and this will in due time be communicated to his conscience, and dwell in his heart: he has free access to the mercy-seat; he is established in the grace and favour of God; and he may now rejoice and triumphantly exult in the hope of everlasting glory; though he perhaps just before trembled, from well-grounded apprehensions of deserved vengeance. How immense then are our obligations to him, who has made "all things ready" by his agonizing death on the cross; and has made our hearts willing by his regenerating grace! May we act as the covenanted friends of our reconciled God; may we "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things;" may we study to recommend it to our fellow-sinners, and to make grateful returns for his love, by our kindness to our poor fellow-Christians, who are the brethren and receivers of this our rich and bountiful Benefactor! (Notes, Matt. 12:46—50. 25:34—40.) Then we need not be dismayed by temptations and afflictions, or despond and murmur under them; nay, we may "glory" and rejoice in them: for, though nature feels that "tribulation worketh" impatience, yet grace finds that at length it produces "patience, experience," and hope, even "hope which maketh not ashamed; because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost." This seal of God cannot be broken, and Satan evidently and peculiarly fails in his attempts to counterfeit it: for all false affections, and enthusiastic confidences, are liable to be consumed in the furnace of long-continued afflictions; and they never can communicate that reciprocal, steady, pre-eminent, and abiding love of God in Christ, which no fire can burn, no waters can quench, and which in ten thousands of instances has proved stronger than the fear of death in its most tremendous forms: and has enabled a feeble believer to disregard the cruelty of a savage executioner, in comparison of the anguish of wilfully denying or disobeying his beloved Lord. Surely he is worthy of all this devotedness from every one of us! If we consider how "helpless, and ungodly," rebellious, and full of enmity against God, we were, when his compassionate eye was first fixed upon us; if we reflect on the salvation purposed for us, the price paid for it, the dignity of our Redeemer, the change wrought in us, before we were willing cordially to accept of the free gift, and the privileges most graciously bestowed upon us; we cannot but allow, that the love of God our Saviour "passeth knowledge," and is infinitely beyond example or illustration. (Notes, Eph. 3:14—19. 1 John 3:1—3.) It is inconceivable, that even God himself could more have "commended his love to us," or have given us more powerful motives and encouragements to humble submission and grateful obedience. In proportion as we feel the force of these motives, we may be assured that we are "justified by the blood of Jesus," and "reconciled to God by his death:" and that we shall be saved from wrath by him, "who was dead, and is alive for evermore, and hath the keys of death and hell." (Notes, John 11:20—27. Rev. 1:12—20.) Though conscious of our own sinfulness, we may thus "glory in God through Jesus Christ," as our almighty, unchangeable, and everlasting Father, Friend, and Portion; and as having "received the reconciliation." (Notes, Ps. 48:14. Heb. 11:13—16.) At the same time we shall learn not to disdain or despair of any other sinners: for we shall be conscious, that they are not worse in themselves, or further from God, than we once were; and that they are equally capable of being reconciled in the same way, whatever their character and crimes may heretofore have been.

CHAPTER VI.

Believers cannot "sin on that grace may abound," as some would object; being "dead to sin," according to the meaning of baptism, which represents their conformity to Christ in his death, burial, resurrection, and living unto God, 1—10. They should reckon themselves to be "dead to sin and alive to God," 11; and, as not being "under the law, but under grace," they must not suffer "sin to reign in their bodies," but yield them to God, as instruments of righteousness," 12—15. Being "made free from sin, and become servants to righteousness," they should serve righteousness wholly, 16—20. The service of sin is unfruitful, shameful, and destructive; but the servants of God have their "fruit unto holiness, and the end eternal life," 21, 22. This is the free gift of God in Christ; but death is the wages of sin, 23.

[a] WHAT shall we say then? [b]shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound?

V. 12—21. Let us from this portion of the sacred Scriptures learn habitually to look upon ourselves, and the whole human race, as lying in the ruins of the fall; sinners by nature and practice, exposed to condemnation, and no more able to save our own souls from hell, than to rescue our bodies from the grave. Instead of perplexing ourselves about the awfully deep and incomprehensible, but most righteous dispensation of God, in permitting the entrance of sin and death; let us learn to adore his grace for providing so adequate a remedy for that awful catastrophe, which we are sure was consistent with all his glorious perfections. (Note, Gen. 2:16,17.)—As our children have evidently, through us, received a sinful, suffering, and dying nature from the first Adam; we should be stirred up, even by their pains and sorrows in helpless infancy, to seek for them the blessings of the second Adam's righteousness and salvation. (Note, 1 Cor. 15:45—49.) Though "the grace of God," and the gift by grace, have "much more abounded" to the many "through Christ," than justice and wrath did through Adam: yet multitudes choose to remain under the horrid dominion of sin and death, rather than seek the blessings of "the reign of grace!" But there is the fullest encouragement to every sinner who comes to Christ for his free and holy salvation: and he "will in no wise cast out" one humble supplicant. Let all then flee, without delay, to "this righteousness, by faith in Christ," whilst grace fills the throne of God, and before the Judge ascends his dread tribunal: let the entrance of the law into the conscience, that sin may be known to abound, impel the sinner to the greater diligence in applying for salvation: let none be discouraged by the view of their enormous crimes, seeing there is in Christ "much more abounding grace:" let the unestablished inquirer give diligence to make sure his interest in the Redeemer; and let the thankful and confirmed believer frequently meditate on his obligations, privileges, securities, and prospects. Let him contrast his state in Adam, with his felicity in Christ: that while he gives all the glory to divine grace, through the "obedience by which he is made righteous:" he may look at all enemies and remaining obstacles, and at "the king of terrors," with a victorious hope; assured that "grace shall still reign through righteousness, unto eternal life, by Jesus Christ our Lord."

NOTES.—Chap. VI. V. 1, 2. (Note, 5:20,21.) The apostle was aware that his doctrine might seem open to the objection, which is now continually made to that of "salvation by grace." (Note, 3:29—31.) It might be said, that we be justified of entire mercy, by the imputation of Christ's righteousness, and the efficacy of his sacrifice, through faith alone, without works of any kind, or in any degree, either before or after believing; are not men set free from all moral obligation, and the floodgates of licentiousness thrown open? And, if God take occasion from man's excess in wickedness, the more conspicuously to display his abounding grace: may we not safely, and even on principle, commit more and greater enormities, and continue to work iniquity, without remorse or amendment, on purpose that the riches of divine grace may be the more glorified in our salvation? This is specious: and

2 [c]God forbid: [d]How shall we that are [e]dead to sin [f]live any longer therein?

3 [g]Know ye not, that so many of us, [h]as [i]were baptized into Jesus Christ, [i]were baptized into his death?

4 Therefore [k]we are buried with him by baptism into death; [l]that like as Christ was raised up from the dead [m]by the glory of the Father, [n]even so we also should walk in newness of life.

self-deceived hypocrites, through Satan's suggestions, comment in this manner on the gospel: and so give some colour to the cavils of avowed opposers. But the apostle has taught us how to answer all objections, and guard against abuses on this ground. He does not set us an example of keeping out of sight, explaining away, or cautiously proposing the free grace of the gospel: but, while he states his doctrine in the most explicit and decisive language imaginable, he shows also the inseparable connexion between justification and sanctification. Let "the thought be abhorred," says he, "of continuing in sin that grace may abound." The unbeliever has no part in that grace: and, as the believer is "dead to sin, how shall he live any longer" in the practice of it? That view of the glory of God, of the holiness and excellency of the law, and of his own guilt and danger, which, as the effect of regeneration, convinced him that he needed the salvation of Christ, and made it precious to his heart, led him also to repent, and to abhor all sin. This change, begun in convictions, always humbling and often alarming, was more completely effected by further discoveries of the mercy, and experience of the comforts, of redemption: so that love and gratitude to the divine Saviour, and other evangelical principles, concur with hatred of sin, to mortify his affections to its pleasures and interests, and to cause him to separate from iniquity, as a dead man ceases from the actions of life. (Marg. Ref. c—f. Notes, John 16:8—11,14,15. 2 Cor. 5:13—15. Gal. 2:17—21. 5:13—26. Jam. 2:8—26.) Not only ought this to be the believer's character, but in a measure it actually is so: and thus it forms the proper evidence, being the inseparable concomitant, of his justification. This effectually secures him from abusing the doctrines of grace: he may be seduced into sin, but he "cannot live any longer" in the habitual practice of known transgression: (Note, 1 John 3:4—10.) he cannot take occasion from grace as superabounding, to continue in sin that it may still more abound; but, on the contrary, in proportion to his admiring views of the riches of divine mercy in his salvation, he will be "steadfast, unmoveable, and always abounding in the work of the Lord;" and he will be remiss in duty at those times alone when such hopes and affections grow languid and low.—'The benefits of justification and sanctification are connected by a perpetual bond; each of them flows from Christ, by the grace of God. Sanctification is the destruction of sin, that is, of our original depravity; in the place of which the purity of a renewed nature succeeds. This is the quality, which the Spirit creates in the members of Christ our Head.—"Dying unto sin," and "living unto God," or Christ, or righteousness, answer to each other.' Beza.—It is surprising, that many learned expositors should, without hesitation or proof, interpret the phrase, as if it only meant the outward profession made in baptism: and, as if all baptized persons were indeed "dead unto sin." 'Note here, that if the faith, to which St. Paul in this epistle doth ascribe justification, did not only oblige to, but even comprehend evangelical and constant obedience, there could be no colour for this objection: that therefore must be a mistake.' Whitby.

Shall we continue (1) Επιμενουμεν. 11:22. See on Acts 13: 43—Are dead to sin. (2) Απεθανομεν τη αμαρτια. 10. Gal. 2:19. Col. 2:20. 3:3. Notes, Gal. 6:11—14. 1 Pet. 2:18—25, v. 24.

V. 3, 4. The apostle, by his introductory question, most emphatically shows, that all who had been baptised into the name and religion of Jesus, had received the sign and made the profession, of communion with him, and conformity to him in his death, that, in virtue of his dying for their sins, they should die to all sin, and have done with their former unholy indulgences, pursuits, habits, and connexions. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. g, h. Notes, 2:25—29. 1 Cor. 12:12—14. Gal. 3:26—29. Col. 2:11,12. 1 Pet. 3:21,22. 2 Pet. 1:8, 9.) This profession was equivalent to "being buried with Christ," as dead with him. For, as his burial was a manifestation that he was really dead, and an introduction to his immediate resurrection, by the glorious power of the Father, and for the display of his glory: so the baptism of a converted Jew, or Gentile, was a professed manifestation of his death to sin, and to all his carnal expectations, affections, and pursuits, from which he meant to be entirely secluded, as one buried is from the affairs of life; and it was a professed introduction to his walking "in newness of life," not only as to his outward actions, but with respect to his inward principles. (Marg. Ref. k—n. Note, 7:5,6.) The spiritual meaning of the external sign is the same, when baptism is administered to the infant offspring of believers: even as the meaning of circumcision was the same, when it was performed on Abraham the aged believer, on Ishmael who perhaps never believed, and on Isaac an infant of eight days old, long before he believed. (Notes, 4:9—12. Gen. 17:7—12. Matt. 28:19,20.) It was the outward sign of regeneration, or 'a death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness;' and it sealed justification by faith to all those who ever possessed the thing signified, but to none else. Thus Simon Magus, though baptized adult, derived no more benefit from the outward sign, than those multitudes do, who, having been baptized in infancy, when grown up despise the inward and spiritual grace of it. (Notes, Acts 8:9—13,36—40.) Great stress has been laid upon the expression, "buried with him by baptism into death," as proving that baptism ought to be performed by immersion, to which the apostle is supposed to allude. (Note, Col. 2:11,12.) But we are said also to be "crucified with Christ," and circumcised with him, without any allusion to the outward manner in which crucifixion and circumcision were performed: and, as baptism is far more frequently mentioned, with reference to the "pouring out" of the Holy Ghost; (Notes, Acts 1:4—8. 2:14—21. Tit. 3:4—7.) and as the apostle is evidently treating on the inward meaning, not the outward form of that ordinance; no conclusive argument is deducible from the expression, showing that immersion is necessary to baptism; or even, apart from other proof, that baptism was generally thus administered.

We are buried. (4) Συνεταφημεν. Col. 2:12. Not elsewhere. Ex συν et θαπτω, sepelio.—Newness.] Καινοτητι. 7:6. Not elsewhere. Καινος, novus.

V. 5—7. 'By an elegant metaphor, the apostle compares Christ who died and was buried, and rose again from the dead, to a plant, which being covered in the earth, germinates in due time. And then, because he had said, that we are "dead to sin, and buried with Christ," that we might rise again unto righteousness; in order to intimate that all these things take place by the grace which we derive from Christ, he says that we have grown together with him into one plant; as those things which are "planted together" with a tree, grow together, and live by one common sap.' Beza. 'We grow together with Christ, as moss, ivy, misseltoe, or such like, grew up by a tree, and are nourished by the juice thereof.' Leigh. Sinful men then become "one with Christ," by partaking of the Holy Spirit, which animates his whole mystical body, as the soul does our natural bodies; and by the teaching and influence of the Holy Spirit, they believe unto justification; and then faith renders them in that way "one with Christ;" but the same Spirit also inclines and enables them to mortify all their sinful passions, and thus renews their souls unto holiness. If then, a man be "planted together" with Christ "in the likeness of his death," he most certainly will be conformed to him "in the likeness of his resurrection;" and, by motives and grace derived from him, habitually live a holy life, according to a new rule, and for new ends and purposes. (Marg. Ref. o, p. Note, 7:5,6.) For he will know, that Christ was crucified to atone for sin, in order that he might mortify and destroy it. So that the corrupt nature, the "old man," is, in all true believers, crucified with Christ, by the grace derived from his cross. It is deprived of dominion, and proscribed as an enemy and condemned criminal: its destruction is absolutely determined: it is weakened, confined, and in a disgraced, suffering, and dying state; though it yet lives and struggles for life, and even for liberty and victory. Nor is there any intention, either in the believer or his gracious Lord, to release the crucified rebel: die he must, though in a lingering manner; the whole body of sin, every kind and degree of nonconformity to the holy law of God, must be "abolished" and destroyed: that the believer may no more be the slave of sin, and that at length he may be finally delivered from its harassing emotions. (Marg. Ref. q—s.) For he that is dead to the love and practice of sin is freed for ever from its yoke: he has passed into the service of another master; sin has no further claim upon him, and shall never recover its lost authority. (Marg. Ref. t. Notes, 8:3,4,12,13. Gal. 5:22—26. Col. 2:11,12.) Thus the seventh verse is commonly explained; but it is most exactly translated: "He that is dead, has been justified from sin;" (Marg. Note, 8:1,2.) and the literal meaning seems still more aptly to coincide with the apostle's argument: he and he only, who "is dead to sin," has been justified from the guilt of it, "having received the free gift unto justification of life." (Note, 5:15—19, v. 18.) His death to sin is the requisite attestation of his being accounted righteous; so that the doctrine properly understood, is incapable of that perversion which is generally objected to with him, [r]that the body of sin might be destroyed, [s]that henceforth we should not serve sin.

7 For [t]he that is dead is [u]freed from sin.

8 Now, [v]if we be dead with Christ, [x]we believe that we shall also live with him:

9 Knowing that [y]Christ, being raised from the dead, dieth no more; [z]death hath no more dominion over him.

10 For in that he died, [a]he died unto sin once: but in that he liveth, [b]he liveth unto God.

11 Likewise [c]reckon ye also yourselves to [d]be dead indeed unto sin, [e]but alive unto God [f]through Jesus Christ our Lord.

12 Let [g]not sin therefore reign in your [h]mortal body, that ye should obey it [i]in the lusts thereof.

13 Neither [k]yield ye your members as [l]instruments of unrighteousness unto sin: but [l]yield yourselves unto God, as those that are [m]alive from the dead, and [n]your members as instruments of righteousness unto God:

14 For [o]sin shall not have dominion over you: [p]for ye are not under the law, but [q]under grace.

it.—Indeed, Christ when "he died unto sin once," (10) was justified as our Surety and exemplar, in consequence of his death: so that the believer's conformity to his Lord, of which the apostle discourses, is illustrated by the literal translation.—Our old man. (6) Our depraved nature is called "a man;" because it comprises a complete system of unholy dispositions and affections, and imparts its baleful influence to the whole soul and body: and the "old man;" because derived from the first Adam, and so in every one prior to grace, or the image of the second Adam. V. 8—10. The promise of God to give life, even eternal life, to all who believe, is the sole ground of our hope of obtaining the inestimable blessing: but as all who hear the gospel do not obtain it, nor all who profess and seem to believe it; how, shall we know that we, rather than our fellow-sinners, are partakers of the promise, except by being conscious of having experienced a 'death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness?' If a professed Christian is a stranger to this change, his confidence of "reigning with Christ in glory" is presumptuous. But when a man becomes dead to his once most beloved sinful pleasures and pursuits; his prospect is clear, and his interest in the righteousness of the Surety is demonstrated. (Marg. Ref. u, x. Notes, 5:6—10. John 14:18—20. Gal. 2:17—21.) "Christ rose from the dead, no more" to be subjected to death; seeing the end for which he died was fully answered. He could never have been liable to death, had it not been on account of our sins, imputed to him as our Surety, to expiate which "he died unto sin once:" (Note, Heb. 9:24—26.) but, having accomplished that grand and gracious design, he rose again, and now in our nature, as one with the Father, he lives a heavenly life, in unspeakable exaltation and felicity, to the glory of the divine perfections and government, by carrying on and perfecting his mediatorial work, "as Head over all things to his church." (Marg. Ref. y—b.) In like manner, therefore, in conformity to his death and resurrection "we die unto sin," are delivered from its dominion, and rise to a new life, to fall no more under that bondage; but henceforth for ever to live unto God, and to find happiness in his holy service, and in glorifying his name.—As the blessed Jesus was in himself wholly free from sin; it seems impossible to find any satisfactory meaning in the words, "He died unto sin once;" unless we allow, that he died as an atoning sacrifice for the sins of men which were imputed to him, and that he "bare them in his own body on the tree." (Notes, Col. 2:20—23. 3:1—4. Heb. 9:27,28. 1 Pet. 2:18—25, v. 24. 4:1,2.)

V. 11. The preceding verses declare the character and experience of real Christians, according to their measure of grace: but the apostle here proceeds to exhort professed Christians to evince their sincerity by a suitable conduct; and believers to live up to their privileges, and in consistency with their profession. For this end, let them "account themselves to be dead indeed unto sin," and be influenced by this to a resolute rejection of all its allurements and temptations: and let them consider themselves, as "alive unto God" through the redemption of his Son; that they may experience more powerfully the motives of the gospel, to devote all their lives, talents, and capacities to his service, and to seek all their happiness in glorifying him. (Marg. Ref.)

Reckon.] Λ λογιζεσθε. See on 3:28.—Dead unto sin.] Νεκρους τη ἁμαρτια. Eph. 2:1,5. Col. 2:13. The context clearly shows, that being "dead to sin," or "from sin," is meant: and not "dead in sins:" and sanctification by union with Christ, not pardon through his atonement, is the benefit insisted on. This appears by the clause "Our old man is crucified with him:" (6) that is, not our persons, but our depraved nature and propensities.—(Note, 1,2.)

V. 12, 13. 'The vicious affections, like noxious weeds, sprout up and increase of themselves but too naturally; while the graces of the Christian temper, exotics in the soil of the human heart, like the more tender productions of the vegetable world, (though the breath of heaven must quicken them,) require on our part also, in order to their being preserved in health and vigour, constant superintendence and assiduous care.' Wilberforce's View of Practical Christianity.—Let none therefore suffer sin to reign in their bodies, (which are indeed become mortal, and which no attention or care or gratification can preserve from the grave,) that they should obey and comply with its corrupt lustings, to the injury of their immortal souls. If a professed Christian does this habitually, he can have no evidence of his conversion: as provision is made in the gospel for deliverance from the dominion of sin, as well as from condemnation: and if a real Christian does this in any particular instances, it must weaken his evidence and confidence; and it is the effect of partial unbelief, unwatchfulness, and forgetfulness of his obligations and privileges. (Marg. Ref. g—i. Notes, 8:12,13. 1 Cor. 9:24—27.) Let then none yield, or consign over, the members, senses, or organs of their bodies, to be employed as the instruments, or weapons, of the carnal propensities of the soul, in doing the work or carrying on the warfare of unrighteousness, by the commission of sin; by being inlets to sinful thoughts or affections into the heart; by communicating the inward evil to pollute others with corrupt words; (Note, Jam. 3:3—12.) or by gratifying any sensual, malevolent, covetous, or ambitious inclination. But rather let them "yield" and give up themselves wholly unto God, as alive from the condemnation and death of sin, by his abundant grace; that all their powers of body and soul may be consecrated to his service, as instruments of his work, in all righteousness, to his glory; or as weapons with which to fight his battles, against sin, the world, and Satan. (Marg. Ref. k—n. Notes, 2 Cor. 5:13—15. 2 Cor. 10:1—6.) Thus our eyes should be employed in contemplating the works, and reading the word, of God; our ears, in hearing his voice, and in attending to the cries of the distressed; our tongues in speaking the praises of God, instructing the ignorant, preaching his word, and in profitable conversation: and even our natural inclinations, should be so regulated by his law, and subordinated to superior considerations, that "whether we eat, or drink, or whatever we do, we may do it to the glory of God." (Notes, 16—19. 12:1. 1 Cor. 6:18—20. 10:29—33. Phil. 1:19,20. Col. 3:16,17. 1 Pet. 2:11.)—Is it not most evident, that sin is here represented as having its seat in the soul, which employs the members of the body, as instruments of accomplishing its evil purposes? And if so, what becomes of that system of interpretation, which supposes animal nature to be the flesh, and the rational soul the spirit? (Notes, 7:15—25. 8:1—13. Gal. 5:16—26.)

V. 14, 15. Hope of victory gives fresh ardour to the courageous: assurance of it would make a coward valiant. The slave emancipated from his yoke, or the captive escaped from his dungeon, will resist all attempts to reduce him to his former abject state, with a vigour proportioned to the prospect of preserving his beloved liberty. Thus the apostle assures believers, that sin shall not resume its hated dominion over them, in order to animate their opposition to its influence, in every instance. He shows, that the ground, for this assurance of final liberty and victory, lies in the nature and securities of the new covenant. (Marg. Ref. o—q. Notes, 2 Sam. 23:5. Is. 55:1—3. Jer. 31:31—34. 32:39—41. Heb. 8:7—13.) He could not intend, merely to distinguish between the Mosaic dispensation and that of the gospel: for all were not slaves to sin who were under the former, nor are all free from sin who live under the latter. But the moral law, as the foundation of the covenant of works, in whatever way or degree it is known, is evidently opposed to the covenant of grace. All who remain under the covenant of works, must be held under "the dominion of sin," and their efforts to emancipate themselves be unsuccessful; because no grace is by it promised or communicated to a sinner. (Note, Ex. 19:5.) But the believer passes from under this covenant, to be under that of mercy and grace; and as motives and encouragements are by it supplied, so effectual help is ensured to him, to preserve him from ever again becoming the willing slave of any sin; though he may be grievously harassed, baffled, or even polluted, by those temptations and corruptions to which he once was wholly subjected. (Notes, 7:15—25.) As an objection to this, it is here inquired by some supposed opponent, May Christians then safely commit sin, because "they are not under the law but under grace?" To this the apostle answers with his usual energetic expression of abhorrence. A carnal man, taking it for granted that he is not "under the law, but under grace;" because of some change of notions or flow of affections, may thus pervert the doctrine of perseverance, as well as that of justification: but the true believer cannot; his heart rises against the hated suggestion, and he must reject it with decided detestation: or if betrayed to yield to it in any instance; he must abhor himself, and deeply repent of such horrid ingratitude and perverseness. (Notes, 1,2. Gal. 5:16—18. 1 John 3:4—10.)

Under the law. (14) Ὑπο νομον. 15. See on 4:15.

V. 16—19. It could not but be known, and acknowledged, that all Christians were "the servants of God." (Notes, Is. 54:15—17. John 12:23—26.) The apostle therefore demanded whether it might not be proved, what master any man served, by observing the constant tenor of his conduct. A person may do an occasional service for one, to whom he is not servant: but no doubt he is the servant of that man, to whom he habitually yields and addicts himself; and in whose work he spends his time and strength, and skill, and abilities, day after day, and year after year. The case is the same in spiritual matters; a man may profess Christianity, and in some things appear to serve God; and yet habitually addict himself to sinful pursuits and pleasures. (Marg. Ref. u. Note, Matt. 6:24.) But every one must be adjudged to be the servant of that master, to execute whose commands he willingly "yields himself;" (Note, 2 Chr. 30:12.) whether it be the sinful propensities of his own heart, in such actions as lead to death: or the new and spiritual obedience implanted by regeneration, in habitually performing the righteousness required in the law, and daily seeking, and striving, and praying, to be more and more exactly conformed to it. (Marg. Ref. x.) The apostle, however, not only congratulated the Romans, but likewise thanked God, on account of the change which had taken place in them. They had been the willing devoted slaves of sin, which they uniformly obeyed, by gratifying their various worldly and sensual inclinations, without regard to the authority or glory of God. But they had now cordially obeyed the call of the gospel: they had "been delivered," or "cast into the very fashion of it;" as melted metal receives and retains the exact impression of the mould into which it is poured. Being thus renewed into the nature of the humble, holy, and loving gospel of Christ; they were set at liberty from the slavery of sin, and "became the servants of righteousness," obeying the dictates of that new nature, which is, as it were, God's representative in the heart, even as sin is that of Satan. These things the apostle stated to the Christians at Rome, by similitudes taken from the affairs of men, "because of the infirmity of their flesh:" which rendered them less capable of understanding abstract reasonings on subjects of this kind; and that he might guard them against these delusions, to which their weakness and remaining sinfulness would otherwise expose them. As therefore, before their conversion, they had "yielded their bodies," as the instruments of their souls, to be "the slaves" of uncleanness and injustice; thus continually accumulating guilt, adding strength to evil propensities, and furthering the cause of wickedness and ungodliness in the world: even so ought they now to devote themselves wholly to be "the servants of righteousness," or to execute constantly the commands of God, the dictates of his Spirit, and the motions of the new nature: that, by progressive sanctification, they might press forward to perfect holiness; and do what they could to render others also holy and happy. (Marg. Ref. z—i. Notes, Tit. 3:4—7. 1 Pet. 2:13—17.)

V. 20. The willing slaves of sin, though by no means free from obligations to be righteous, are yet unrestrained by these obligations in following their own carnal inclinations. They perform no service to righteousness; they are not influenced by a single regard to the glory or authority of God, in any of their actions; but they uniformly gratify some of their own unholy passions, and seek happiness in so doing; or in one way or other, are actuated by selfish motives: so that nothing which they do is "good before God."

Free from righteousness.] "To righteousness." Marg. Ελευθεροι τῃ δικαιοσυνῃ.—Ελευθερος, 7:3. John 8:33,36. Gal. 3:28. 1 Pet. 2:16.—'Liber, non servus. . . . a servitute immunis.' Schleusner. "The dominion of sin" consists in willingly being slaves to it; not in being harassed by its hated power, and occasional prevalence; as an expelled usurper struggling to resume his throne: and being "made free from sin," means deliverance from the "dominion of sin;" not an exemption from its distressing and hated strugglings for victory and dominion; as many erroneously suppose, to their deep disconsolation. (Note, Luke 11:14—26, vv. 21,22.)

V. 21—23. The apostle here calls on the Christians at Rome, and on his readers, to declare, what advantages they had acquired in the service of sin. What was the "fruit" produced by those evil actions, of which, as penitents, they were at length ashamed? (Marg. Ref. m, n. Notes, Jer. 31:18—20. Ez. 16:60—63. 36:31,32.) They could not but know, that vanity, vexation, disappointment, disgrace, disease, remorse, fear, and sorrow, always attended or followed sinful indulgences; besides the fatal effects caused by them to others: and therefore, if this life alone were considered, they could have rational inducement to return to them. But, besides all present bad consequences, "the end of these things is death;" and it would be a mere delusion to suppose that any creed or profession could preserve the habitual transgressor from this condemnation. (Marg. Ref. o. Notes, 5:12—21.) As "death" is here opposed to "everlasting life;" and as temporal death is the end of the most godly life, as well as the most ungodly; it is clearly absurd to restrict his meaning to the death of the body: doubtless

CHAPTER VII.

The believer's state, as "dead to the law," and united to Christ, that he may serve God "in newness of Spirit," is illustrated by the law concerning marriage, 1—6. Through the depravity of human nature, the moral law, though "spiritual, holy, just, and good," can only occasion sin and death, 7—13. The painful conflict of those, who "delight in the law of God," but are not able to keep it, 14—24; and their prospect of deliverance by Christ, 25.

[a]KNOW ye not, [b]brethren, (for I speak to [c]them that know the law) how that [d]the law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth?

2 For [c]the woman which hath a husband, is bound by the law to her husband so long as he liveth; but if the husband be dead, she is loosed from the law of her husband.

3 So then [f]if while her husband liveth, she be married to another man, she shall be called an adulteress; but if her husband be dead, she is free from that law; so that she is no adulteress, [g]though she be married to another man.

4 Wherefore my brethren, [h]ye also are become dead to the law by [i]the body of Christ; [k]that ye the apostle meant the future state of final misery, in a total separation from the presence and favour of God, and under his awful wrath and vengeance. (8:13. Notes, Gen. 2:16, 17. Rev. 20:11—15.) From this condemnation the believer is set at liberty, when "made free from sin;" as the removal of the malefactor's fetters, and the opening of his dungeon, are evidences that his offences are pardoned, and the consequence of his reconciliation. Then, he "becomes a servant of God:" thenceforth he has "his fruit unto holiness;" i. e. the nature and effects of his conduct are holy: this tends to the increasing "sanctification" of his own, and also to promote the general cause of truth and holiness, against that of delusion, sin, and misery; and it terminates in perfect holiness. So that, instead of death, at the end of his course, he is put in possession of everlasting life; of which he had many foretastes, in holy consolations, when serving God in newness of life. (Marg. Ref. p—s. Note, John 4:10—15.) But, this happy event of his conduct, is not to be considered as a merited reward. Indeed death, temporal, spiritual, and eternal is the stipend, or stipulated and deserved "wages of sin," even of every violation of God's law: this every man has earned, or deserved, and every unbeliever will receive. But "eternal life is the gift of God" to those who condemn themselves, and renounce all dependence on their defective and defiled services, to rely entirely on divine grace, through the righteousness and atonement of Jesus Christ: and that holiness, which is the meetness for heavenly happiness, is as much "the gift of God through Christ," as that imputed righteousness which is the believer's title to it. (Marg. Ref. t, u. Notes, 5:20,21. 1 John 5:11,12.)—Thus the apostle closes his argument concerning justification, and sanctification, as the seal and evidence of it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4. Self-righteous pride, and antinomian licentiousness, are two fatal rocks, on which immense multitudes are continually wrecked, and between which none but the Holy Spirit can pilot us: and the objections of open enemies to the doctrines of grace, derive their greatest plausibility from the unholy lives of many professed friends. The mercy of God is indeed glorified in proportion to the abounding of sin, which is freely pardoned to the penitent; but his justice will be glorified in the deepest condemnation of those, who "continue in sin, that grace may abound." Every true believer abhors the thought of thus perverting the gospel, and despising the riches of divine grace; (Note, 2:4—6.) and could he even be deluded into an opinion, that he might go on in sin with impunity, he would be kept back by a strong aversion from it: for how can he, in whose heart those principles are mortified, which gave rise to his former sinful courses, continue in those practices, in which he now has no pleasure, but which he loathes and dreads? Indeed our baptism may instruct us in the necessity of thus dying to sin, and being "buried," as it were, from all ungodly and unholy pursuits, and of rising to "walk with God in newness of life:" and unholy professors of Christianity (alas, how numerous are they!) belie and virtually renounce their baptism. They have had the outward sign alone of 'death unto sin, and a new birth unto righteousness;' they have never passed from the family of Satan into that of God; nor have they ever renounced the world, the flesh, and the devil, to believe in Christ, and keep his commandments.

V. 5—15. If indeed we have been so made "one with Christ," as to stand accepted in his righteousness; we shall certainly have conformity to him in his death and resurrection: and his grace will enable us to "crucify the old man, with his affections and lusts," and excite us to determine on the destruction of "the whole body of sin;" that we may no more serve that hated enemy which crucified our beloved Lord; nor ever rest satisfied, till it has no place in our souls. Thus, by looking to our crucified, risen, and glorified Redeemer, and believing that we shall live together with him; we should be animated to "reckon ourselves dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God through him."—As our "mortal bodies" will at last be raised immortal and incorruptible, by the almighty power of the Saviour; (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:50—58 Phil. 3:20,21.) so we should never allow "sin to reign" in them, or obey it in the lusts thereof; but, praying earnestly for help from above, we should refuse to yield any of our senses, or members, to be the instruments of unrighteousness; and seek to have them all devoted to God, and employed in his service; as those who have already entered on that divine and happy life, which we hope to lead to all eternity.—To this we may be encouraged, by the nature of the new covenant. If we be indeed Christians, we are "not under the law," which gives no power, and proposes no mercy; but "under" the "grace" of the gospel: and this ensures to the regenerate and believing the preservation and perfection of that "liberty, with which Christ hath made him free." (Notes, Gal. 5:1—6,13—15.)

V. 16—23. The real Christian finds, by experience, that his heart, as well as his state, is made new: he has most cordially changed his master and his work: he remembers that once he was the wretched slave of sin; but he thanks God, that he has both heard, understood, believed, and obeyed the gospel. Thus he found his mind cast into the form of it: and as the same metal becomes a new vessel, when melted and cast into the mould; so he became "a new creature," when being thus "made free from sin he became the servant of righteousness." Notwithstanding, therefore, "the infirmities of his flesh," he aims, and prays to be enabled, to spend all his powers and capacities of body and soul in the service of righteousness, unto increasing holiness; even as he once yielded them to serve his sinful passions, unto abounding iniquity.—Those who now are the servants of God, once were the slaves of sin, and in like manner they who now are the slaves of sin, may become "the servants of God," through the gospel. We ought therefore diligently to use every means with those who are yet unchanged, in dependence on the divine blessing to render them effectual: and when the change takes place, we should heartily thank God for it.—We may boldly inquire of sinners, What fruit they gather from their vices? What real good they ever derived from ungodliness and iniquity! We may show them that all men must be ashamed of these things; either in deep repentance here, or in everlasting contempt and misery hereafter: (Note, Dan. 12:2,3.) for "the end of them is death;" and every wise man will consider in what future consequences his present conduct is likely to terminate. Happy then is he, and he alone, who is covered with shame for his past offences, who is set at liberty from sin, and thus hates and dreads it, and who "has his fruit unto holiness and the end everlasting life."—It is of the Lord's mercy that we have not all received, as well as deserved, "the wages of sin:" but "thanks be to God" for the inestimable gift of his own Son, to be our Salvation, and of eternal life through him. May we all forego our boasts and renounce our vainconfidences; may we come as condemned criminals, not to buy merit, or earn the favour of God, "which is life eternal;" but to supplicate him, for Christ's sake, to bestow it on us as a free gift; that he may have all the glory, both now and for evermore!

NOTES.—CHAP. VII. V. 1—4. The apostle had before said, "Sin shall not have dominion over you; for ye are not under the law, but under grace:" (Note, 6:14,15.) and he here proceeds to confirm and illustrate that proposition. In interpreting these verses, the meaning of the word "law" must be first carefully settled. It must be shown, whether the ceremonial law in particular, or the Mosaic dispensation in general; or the moral law, as requiring perfect obedience in order to "justification of life," be intended. (Note, 3:19,20.) Most expositors explain it either of the ceremonial law, or the Mosaic dispensation; but they do not assign any satisfactory reason, why sin must have dominion over a man, as long as he continued under the ceremonial law, or the Mosaic dispensation; or why deliverance from the law, in this sense, by professing the gospel, should ensure his liberty from that slavery; indeed no such reason can be assigned. No doubt, great numbers, under the Mosaic dispensation, were both justified and sanctified, by the mercy and grace of the new covenant; and their relation to the law did not prevent them from being made "free from sin." (Note, Ex. 19:5.) On the other hand, immense numbers remain slaves to sin under the Christian dispensation; and their external privileges and profession do not deliver them. (Notes, 2 Cor. 3:7—11. Gal 4:21—31.) But so long as a man continues "under the law, as a covenant, and seeks justification by his own obedience he inevitably continues the slave of sin, in one form or othebecause nothing but "the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus" can make any sinner "free from the law of sin and death;" (Note, 8:3,4.) and, on the other hand, every one who is delivered from the law, as a covenant, by living faith in Christ, is, by the "Spirit of life" given to him, delivered from the bondage of sin, which shall never more have dominion over him.—The apostle's argument, through all the subsequent parts of this chapter, relates exclusively to the moral law, and refers especially to the tenth commandment; as those who explain these verses of the ceremonial law, or the Mosaic dispensation, are constrained to admit: (Notes, 7—12.) and though he speaks in the first three verses of the law, in a more general sense; it should be noticed, that he is only illustrating his main subject by an apt similitude.—'When the apostle particularly meant the ceremonial, in distinction from the moral law, he frequently spoke of it in diminutive terms. (Eph. 2:15. Col. 2:20. Heb. 8:13. 9:10.) ... But none of these lessening or distinctive characters of the law are found in this epistle, ... to restrain it to the ceremonial law, in what is said about justification by its works.' Guise.—These remarks may prepare the way for that interpretation of this passage, and of the chapter, which, after mature deliberation, I have given.—Many Jewish converts to Christianity resided at Rome, and the apostle, it is probable, more immediately intended these, when he said, "I speak to them that know the law." But several of the Gentile converts had doubtless got acquainted with the books of Moses. (Marg. Ref. c.) Now, it was well known by them, that the law retained its authority over a man, to enforce obedience, or inflict punishment, "as long as he lived." In ordinary cases, death alone dissolved the relation between the Jew and the law: yet, in particular instances, the law became dead, and lost its authority to command or condemn a man, through his change of circumstances: and when the Jew became a Christian, and understood his Christian liberty, his relation to the Mosaic dispensation was finally terminated. From this case of a Jew, in respect of the law of Moses, as the condition of the national covenant, (Notes, Ex. 19:5. 24:3,4. Gal. 3:15—18. Heb. 8:7—13. 9:18—23.) they might learn how the matter stood in respect of the moral law, as the condition of the covenant of works. The law respecting marriage in particular would aptly illustrate the subject. The married woman was bound to her husband in the strictest bonds; and, while the moral law forbad adultery, the judicial law condemned the adulteress to death: but this law became dead to her, and she to it by the death of her husband. If before this, she had been married to another man, the law would have condemned her to an ignominious capital punishment; but after her husband's death, she incurred no penalty by marrying another man. (Marg. Ref. e—g.)—The apostle does not, in this place, state the precepts concerning marriage, under the Christian dispensation; he merely shows, in one particular, how the case stood under the law: he says nothing concerning divorces or polygamy; neither does he intimate, that the man would be an adulterer, who took another wife while his former was living, and not legally divorced: yet our Lord has taught this. (Notes, Matt. 19:3—9.) It would therefore be foreign to the apostle's design to interpret his words, as meaning that a woman, who had been equitably divorced for consanguinity, which rendered her former marriage a nullity, or for any other cause, would be guilty of adultery, if she married again during her former husband's life: for neither the law of Moses, nor the precepts of Christ, inculcate any such thing.—Now the case of the believer, in respect of the subject under consideration, bore some analogy to that which had been stated. Not only were the Jewish converts "dead to" the Mosaic law, by its virtual abrogation: but all true Christians were become dead to the moral law, as a covenant of works, "by the body of Christ," by his incarnation, obedience, and sacrifice on the cross for their transgressions. (Marg. Ref. h, i. Note, Eph. 2:14—18.) He having thus answered its demands as their Surety, it had no further power to condemn; but believers were looked upon as if they had fully endured its sentence, and fulfilled its righteousness, by their Surety and Representative. Thus the relation between them and the law, as the condition of a covenant, between God and them, was dissolved, even as marriage is dissolved by the natural or legal death of either party; and this was in order to their being "married to Christ as risen from the dead," that, being united to him, according to the covenant of grace, and made partakers of all his "unsearchable riches," they might, by "the supply of his Spirit," bring forth such fruit in their lives, as bore the holy stamp of God upon it, was meet for his gracious acceptance, and honourable to his name.—It should be remembered, that many (probably most) of the Christians at Rome had been Gentiles, who never were under the Mosaic law; and even the Jewish converts were not, as yet, required to renounce it. This consideration fully proves that no mere change of external state is exclusively meant, as many learned commentators have supposed. (Note, Gal. 2:17—21.)

V. 5, 6. "In the flesh," evidently means an unregenerate state; (Marg. Ref. m. Notes, 18—21. 8:5—9. John 3:6) which is the necessary consequence of being under the covenant of works, and destitute of the grace of the gospel. While, therefore, both Jews and Gentiles were in this state "the motions of sins," or those desires and affections which the law forbad, powerfully exerted themselves, and wrought by the members of the body, or in all the constituent parts of the old man, to produce such thoughts, desires, words, and works, as subjected them to "death" by the sentence of the law; instead of entitling them to "life" as having fulfilled its righteousness. (Marg. Ref. n—q.) But when, by faith in Christ, any of them were delivered from that covenant, and their former relation to the law was dissolved; becoming "dead to it," or it becoming "dead to them," as the wife by the death of her husband, they were brought into a new relation to Christ, and God dealt with them by another covenant. Being therefore now regenerate, and having sure promises of sanctifying grace as well as of pardoning mercy, they were encouraged and enabled to worship and obey God "in newness of spirit," from ingenuous principles according to the spiritual meaning of the precept, in cordial love and gratitude, under the influence of the Holy Spirit; and not merely with external observances, moral or ceremonial, according to the letter of the precept, and the corrupt glosses of the scribes and elders upon it, of which service alone the old nature is capable. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. r, s. Notes, Matt. 5:20—48. 2 Cor. 3:4—6.)—'Some of "the works of the flesh do not require the members of our body," ... but only the faculties of our minds, for their performance. Locke. (Note, Gal. 5:19—21.)

V. 7, 8. It might be objected to the above statement, that if those who were "under the law" inevitably remained the slaves of sin, and if none could serve God "in newness of spirit," till they were "dead to the law," and it to them; surely "the law" and "sin" were in reality the same: and would not this cast a vile aspersion on the holy law of God? (Notes, 1—4. 5:20,21.) To this objection, the apostle answered, with abhorrence of so blasphemous a thought, by observing, that the law and sin were diametrically opposite to each other; and that the former was suited to discover and detect the latter: (Marg. Ref. x. Note, 3:19,20.) so that, in his own case, he himself should not have known the sinfulness of his thoughts, motives, inclinations, and actions, but by the law. That exact balance detected the deficiency of his obedience, and that perfect standard showed the obliquity of his heart and life; (Note, Dan. 5:25—28.) as well as proved his sins to be more aggravated and numerous, than he had ever before imagined: yet, at the same time, it contained no provision of mercy or grace for his relief. Thus the most salutary laws of the community shut up the criminal in a dungeon, load him with fetters, and condemn him to death for the contrariety of his conduct to them; but the clemency of the prince alone can give him a pardon and release.—In particular, the apostle observes that, by his natural conscience without the law, he should not have known that "lust," or coveting, was sinful: he should not have supposed, that, while free from adultery, theft, or murder, the desire of a forbidden indulgence, or an object withheld by Providence, was criminal, even so criminal as to expose him to the curse of the law. (Marg. Ref. y. Notes, Ex. 20:17. Matt. 5:27, 28.) Nay, he should not have felt so many lustings, or covetings, if the very strictness of the commandment "Thou shalt not covet," had not given occasion to them. So that "sin," (his depraved nature spoken of as an agent,) traitorously watching the opportunity of destroying him, "took occasion by the commandment" to excite in his heart "all manner of concupiscence." The imagination began to rove, and the heart to hanker after forbidden objects: and so he was led to conceive of some greater satisfaction in them, than in those which were not forbidden. (Marg. Ref. z, a.)—That man has no deep knowledge of human nature, or the perverse wickedness of his own heart, who does not observe, or is not conscious, of this irrational propensity, to fancy that there is something exquisitely pleasurable, in what is out of our reach, or prohibited.—Indeed it seems natural to expect, that it would be so with the posterity of those, who could be satisfied with no fruit in the garden of God, except that which he had forbidden: amidst the profusion of Eden perhaps that tree had been disregarded, if it had not been prohibited. (Notes, and P. O. Gen. 3:1—6.) We readily observe this propensity in others, especially in our children; though perhaps self-love may make us blind to it in ourselves.—"For without the law sin was dead:" not only the same affections and actions could not have hurt us, if the law had not given sin its condemning power; but the sinful principle lay comparatively in a dead or dormant state; as a frozen serpent is inactive and innoxious, till the warmth enlivens it and it recovers vigour; and then, if provoked, its nature becomes apparent. 'Marg. Ref. b. Note, 8:5—9.) Thus the spiritual precepts and awful sanctions of the law, excite the depravity of the heart by their contrariety to it; as the alkali produces an effervescence by its contrariety to the acid; and so the heart rises in blasphemous enmity to the law, and rushes more impetuously into transgression.—In what sense can this be applied to the ceremonial law, the ordinances of which a carnal mind might readily comply with, provided their relation to the gospel were not perceived? Does the tenth commandment belong to the ceremonial law? Where is the marked transition, from the ceremonial to the moral law, to be found in this discussion? Is not the apostle evidently throughout illustrating one proposition: namely, that 'those who are under the law are slaves to sin?' The inconsistency of expositors, who set out with confining the meaning to the ceremonial law, or the Mosaic dispensation; and then glide, either imperceptibly to themselves, or at least without hinting it to their readers, to the most spiritual precept of the moral law, must be obvious to every attentive student: and the perplexity which arises from this source is inexpressible.—'It is surprising to me, that the learned Mr. Locke, and some others after him, should make the sense of the passage to be, "without the law,"' (meaning the law given by Moses,) '"sin is dead," not able to hurt me; or, without the law of Moses, which annexes death to transgression, sin is as good as dead, is not able to have its will against me, and bring death upon me. For this is contrary to the apostle's peremptory assertions, that "by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin:" "that sin was in the world until," or all along before, "the law:" and that "death reigned from Adam to Moses." (5:12—14.) How then could it be said, that sin was not able to hurt the apostle, or to bring death on him, or upon any other Jew, without the law of Moses: since "it had reigned unto death" so many hundred years before that law was given; and we are told, that the very heathens, who had only the law of nature, knew the judgment of God, that the transgressions of that law were worthy of death? (Rom. 1:32.)' Guise. (Notes, 2:12—16. 5:12—14.)

Επιθυμια, so far from meaning exclusively "lust," in the common acceptation of that term, signifies a strong desire of any kind; and is used in a good sense; (See on Luke 22:15.) or in a general but evil sense. V. 9—12. It seems evident, that the apostle in these verses, and in the subsequent part of the chapter, spoke literally of himself, and his own experience. If he personated another man, why did he not give some intimation of his design? In another place he fairly brought forward the Jew; (Note, 2:17—29.) and ambiguity is no characteristic of his writings. Indeed, I apprehend, that the more humble and spiritual any Christian is, the more clearly will he perceive, that the apostle describes the experience of the true believer, from his first convictions, to his greatest progress in grace during this present imperfect state. His avowed object is to show that the law can do nothing for a sinner, either to justify or sanctify him; and that the believer feels this daily, as long as he lives. "I was," says he, "alive without the law once:" he was once a Pharisee, ignorant of the spirituality of the law, and only attentive to the outward letter; to the corrupt glosses of the scribes, which were suited to limit and explain away even the literal sense of the command; (Notes, Matt. 5:19—22,33—37,43—48. 15:1—14.) and to ceremonies and traditions: and, having some general decency of character, without any acquaintance with his inward depravity, he concluded that his heart and life were good, and that he was in a state of acceptance with God. (Marg. Ref. c, d.) But when "the commandment came" to his conscience, by the convictions of the Holy Spirit, and he perceived its righteous and extensive requirements, and its severe denunciations: he found the sinful propensities of his heart, which before seemed dormant, rise against it; and every endeavour, to fulfil its precepts, showed him more plainly his inability to do it. 'The prohibition of what we desire makes us think the enjoyment of it more sweet and valuable: or at least provokes "the carnal mind, which is not subject to the law of God," to a more fervent lusting after it.... Sin is in Scripture represented as an enemy that seeks our ruin and destruction, and takes all occasions to effect it. 23.... 1 Pet. 2:11.' Whitby. (Notes, 7,8. 5:20,21.) Thus his former hopes died away; he found himself a helpless sinner under merited condemnation, and became as a dead man, except as the gospel revived him from despondency. (Note, 2 Cor. 5:13—15.) Thus the law, of which the promise was, "The man that doeth these things, shall live in them," which was originally ordained to life for holy creatures, and from which he, though a sinner, had expected heaven, was "found to be unto death:" even as the law of any country, which secures the lives of honest men, is "found to be unto death" by the murderer or robber. (Marg. Ref. f—h.)—The ceremonial law was not "ordained unto life," except as it pointed out Christ, the Substance of its shadows; and it was found unto death by none, but those who made it an appendix to the covenant of works, and rejected Christ for the sake of it: and this perfectly coincides with the interpretation above given.—Sin, the corruption of fallen nature, being averse to the holy strictness of the moral law, by its extreme deceitfulness, seduced Paul into various transgressions, and thus slew all his self-righteous hopes, and actually brought him under deeper condemnation. Not that the law caused this, or even gave any just occasion for it: but "sin took occasion" from it; as a wicked man takes occasion from a pious discourse, or a friendly admonition, to scoff, blaspheme, or rage the more. (Marg. Ref. k. Notes, Prov. 9:7—9. 23:9. Matt 7:6. Acts 18:1—6.) The whole law must therefore be allowed to be perfectly holy, the transcript of the divine character; and each commandment, (especially that which prohibits "coveting,") most "holy," and at the utmost distance from moral evil; most "just," as requiring nothing more than what is righteously due to God and our neighbours; and most "good," as tending to the true welfare of ourselves, our families, the community, and all mankind: so that the universal observance of it would almost annihilate the evils of the world, and convert earth into heaven. (Marg. Ref. l, m Notes, Ex. 20:1,17. Ps. 19:7—11. Gal. 3:19—22. 1 Tim. 1:8—11.)—The apostle never passes such eulogiums on the ceremonial law, or the Mosaic dispensation; they had a temporary fitness and goodness; but "they made nothing perfect," and consisted of "carnal ordinances," which continued in force "till the time of reformation" and no longer. (Notes, Heb. 9:8—10.)

made death to those who were under it? Was this its natural tendency and efficacy? (Notes, 5—8.) This conclusion the apostle rejects with detestation. Wholesome food, or a valuable medicine, through a diseased state of the body, or when taken improperly, may "occasion" death, contrary to its general and proper tendency; but poison kills, as a cause, by its native efficacy. The law may occasion death through man's depravity; but sin is the poison that causes death. It was not therefore the law, "but sin," which was made death to the apostle. "Sin took occasion," from the goodness of the law, to manifest its own deformity, odiousness, and dire malignity, by "working death in him, by that which was good," as an intemperate man murders himself, not by a sword or by poison, but by the wholesome gifts of a bountiful Providence. Thus, through the commandment "sin became exceeding sinful;" that is, the odious and ruinous nature of sin, as well as the sinfulness of the human heart, were most clearly shown; in order that the abounding grace of God might appear the more glorious. (Marg. Ref. Note, 5:20,21.)

V. 14. The apostle here proceeds to confirm his position.—"We know," says he, and allow, "that the law is spiritual." It is not like human laws, which reach only to the outward actions, and take no cognizance of the motives, affections, and thoughts; for God chiefly respects these: (Marg. Ref. p. Notes, Ex. 20:1. Deut. 6:5. Ps. 51:5,6.) the law requires an entire conformity to the spiritual excellency of the divine perfections, and such a state of the heart, as approves itself to him, who "is a Spirit:" and it allows of nothing but what is done from the most pure and sublime motives, and in perfect love, zeal, gratitude, and delight. Compared with this most holy rule of conduct, the apostle found that he was "carnal, sold under sin:" his nature was perfectly opposite to this spiritual law: and even, after all his attainments in grace, he found himself so very far short of this perfection, and in every respect so unable to attain to it, though he ardently aspired after it; that he seemed comparatively to be "carnal," and like a man who is sold against his will to a hated master, from whom he can by no means set himself at liberty. (Marg. Ref. q—s.)—Numbers cannot conceive, that St. Paul could mean this of himself as a confirmed believer; and, finding it to be inseparably connected with what follows, they would explain the whole of an awakened Jew, or some other convinced sinner, who is seeking justification by the "works of the law;" or at most of an unconfirmed believer. But such things are spoken, as are true of none but real Christians; and the whole is actually verified in their experience. A believer cannot willingly sell himself to work wickedness, as Ahab did; (Note, 1 Kings 21:25,26.) nor will he imitate those slaves, who love their master and his service, and refuse liberty when offered to them: (Note, Ex. 21:3,6.) yet, when he compares his actual attainments with the spirituality of the law, and with his own desire and aim to obey it; he sees that he is yet to a great degree "carnal" in the state of his mind, and under the power of evil propensities, from which (like a man sold for a slave) he cannot emancipate himself. He is "carnal" in exact proportion to the degree in which he falls short of perfect conformity to the law of God: and he indignantly and reluctantly thus far serves an abhorred master; yet cannot shake off the galling chain, till his powerful and gracious Friend comes to rescue him from it. It is true, this inability lies in the remaining evil of his heart alone: yet it is a real, but most humiliating hinderance to his serving God, as angels and the spirits of just men made perfect do: or as the Saviour did, who could say, "The prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me." (Notes, John 8:27—29. 14:29—31, v. 31.) To this perfect holiness the zealous believer cannot but aspire; nothing short of it will ever satisfy his "hungering and thirsting after righteousness;" and this proves that in another sense he is "made free from sin," that is, set at liberty from its hated dominion, and become the "servant of righteousness." (Note, 6:16—19.)—As the apostle was far more enlightened and humble than Christians in general are, doubtless this clog was more uneasy to him, than it is to them; though most of us find our lives at times greatly imbittered by it. So that this energetic language, which many imagine to describe an unestablished believer's experience, or even that of an unconverted person, seems to have resulted from the extraordinary degree of St. Paul's sanctification, and the depth of his self-abasement and hatred of sin: and the reason of our not readily understanding him seems to be, because we are so far beneath him in holiness, humility, acquaintance with the spirituality of God's law, and the evil of our own hearts, and in our degree of abhorrence of moral evil. (P. O. Matt. 8:5—13. Note, Eph. 3:8.) In the former part of the chapter, the apostle had spoken in the past tense, "I was alive, &c." (9) but here he uses the present, to which he uniformly adheres in what follows. He had described his state, as a blind proud Pharisee; and the manner in which he became "dead to the law," as to dependence on it for justification. (Note, Gal. 2:17—21.) and here he shows, that even, as a confirmed Christian, all his hope and all his holiness must come from Christ, according to the new covenant. Thus in another place he says, "What things were gain to me, these I counted loss for Christ; yea, doubtless, and I count all things but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus, &c." (Notes, Phil. 3:1—11, vv. 7—9.)—Some indeed suppose the transition from the experience of the apostle, under his first convictions, to his subsequent conflict with in dwelling sin, to be made at the next verse: but the change of tense in this place does not admit of that construction.—In the very same chapter, in which our Lord pronounces Peter "blessed," as a believer, he says, "Thou savourest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men:" (Notes, Matt. 16:17—23.) that is, thou art "carnal," not totally, but in a considerable degree. Thus likewise the apostle addresses the Christians at Corinth as carnal, even when he speaks to them, "as babes in Christ." (Note, 1 Cor. 3:1—3.) Humbly to confess, and deeply to lament, that we are thus "carnal and sold under sin," is very far indeed from the disposition and conduct of a willing slave to his lusts: and the readiness, with which numbers of the most eminent believers adopt the apostle's language, shows that it is very suitable to their strong feelings of abhorrence of sin, and of self-abasement. "I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes." (Notes, Job 1:1. 42:1—9. P. O. 1—6.) "Wo is me! for I am undone: for I am a man of unclean lips." (Note, Is. 6:5. P. O. 1—8.) "My soul cleaveth unto the dust." (Note, Ps. 119:25.) "Surely I am more brutish than any man!" (Note, Prov. 30:2,3.)—Indeed all the complaints of the prevalence of sin, and all the longings and pantings after holiness, and all the earnest cries for pardon, teaching, quickening grace, which pervade the book of Psalms, especially the hundred and nineteenth Psalm, are entirely coincident with this complaint of the apostle, and arise precisely from the same source; a "delight in the law of God;" and a painful consciousness of great remaining want of conformity to it. (Notes, Ps. 119:5. Matt. 5:6.)

V. 15—17. The apostle here begins more particularly to enlarge on the conflict, which he daily maintained with the remainder of his original depravity. He was frequently tempted by "the sin that dwelt in him" into such tempers, words, or actions, as he did not approve or allow, in his renewed judgment and affections. He earnestly desired, and fully determined, if possible, to perform a perfect obedience to the law of God; but he continually fell short of this: and, while he "hated" and abhorred every kind and degree of sin, he found it impracticable wholly to avoid committing it in work, or word, or thought. In thus doing what he "hated," and desired above all things to shun, he "consented to the law, that it was good;" and as the prevailing bias of his soul was to holiness, he was evidenced by it to be a regenerate man, under the covenant of grace: so that it would not be laid to his charge, in the day of judgment, that he did the evil which he hated, but it would be placed to the account of "the sin, which dwelt in him" as a detested inmate, and which he was not able to expel, though not willing to obey it. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Ps. 66:18,19. 119:113. Phil. 3:12—14.) The apostle certainly did not mean to excuse his sinfulness, as if he might not justly have been condemned for it: but to show that "righteousness could" in no case "be by the law;" and that, by the grace of the gospel, a man's state and character are determined, according to what habitually prevails in his heart and life; notwithstanding impediments and restraints. A wicked man feels some inward opposition to his crimes, from conscience, fear, or shame; and he meets with various obstacles to the gratification of his desires: yet all this is accounted for nothing, while sin habitually prevails in his heart and conduct, and he does not hate it. (Note, Ps. 36:3,4.) A godly man has great hinderances in his holy progress, from in-dwelling sin and outward temptation: yet this is not imputed to him for condemnation, seeing the prevailing state of his heart and tenor of his conduct are holy. Thus Judas, in betraying Christ, acted in character, according to the habitual, though concealed, state of his heart: it was "Judas that did it:" but Peter, through sudden temptation, acted out of character, and contrary to the habitual state of his heart, in denying Christ: it was "not he, but the sin that dwelt in him;" that is, according to the gracious tenor of the new covenant.

V. 18—21. The apostle "knew, that in him," as a fallen creature, apart from regenerating grace, "no good thing," but sin and only sin was found; though its actings were more specious at one time than another. (Notes, Gen. 6:5. Jer. 17:9,10. Matt. 15:15—20.) It is evident from the limitation, "that is, in my flesh," that he spoke as a believer, who had grace, as well as "sin, dwelling in him:" for by "flesh," in this connexion, he does not mean the body as distinct from the soul, but "the old man," or unregenerate human nature, as the subsequent parts of the argument fully prove: and this nature, derived from fallen Adam, never concurs with the Holy Spirit in regeneration, or with the new man afterwards, but always strives against both. (Marg. Ref. b, c. Notes, 5,6. 8:1—13. John 3:6. Gal. 5:6—18.) The apostle became more deeply acquainted with this humiliating truth by his experience subsequent to conversion, than he had been before. Formerly he perhaps supposed, that a little good disposition, or moral ability to holiness, was in man; but this was now experimentally disproved. As regenerate, he had indeed an habitual willingness to obey the law of God, and to accomplish the good required by it; but his corrupt nature, though dethroned and crucified, made such constant opposition to this, that he could by no means perform what he aimed at. (Marg. Ref. d. Note, Phil. 2:12,13.) So that, in fact, he did not fulfil that measure of good, which he was habitually desirous of doing, but in every thing fell short of his aim: and he was also frequently doing the evil, in some measure or respect, which he was habitually most bent upon avoiding. Now, as he was thus constantly baffled and obstructed, in his earnest persevering desires and endeavours to obey the law; it was evident that it was not properly he, as a believer, who did this; but the traitor and enemy that lodged within his heart. (Note, 15—17.) He was obliged, contrary to his habitually prevalent inclinations, to live under a sort of necessity of being sinful; and he could only persist in maintaining the conflict with his inward enemies, without being able entirely to extirpate them. (Note, Ps. 119:5. 2 Cor. 7:1.) For indeed, he found, by painful experience, that there was "a law" imposed upon him, in his present state of warfare, that, when he was most desirous of "doing good, evil was present with him," to interrupt, intrude, baffle, discourage, and defile him. (Marg. Ref. f, g.)—Let any man who knows his own heart, and the spirituality of the law of God, compare his actual conduct, comprising his thoughts, motives, affections, words, and works, during any given time, with his purposes, prevailing desires, and earnest persevering prayers: let him take that one duty, which he especially aims to perform most perfectly, or that wrong temper, or evil propensity, which he most longs to rectify or extinguish: let him examine himself very exactly in these respects every night; and he will surely find, that he cannot but be a sinner still, and subjected to "a law, that when he would do good, evil is present with him." God has wise reasons for permitting this to be so, especially to give us a deeper sense of the malignity of sin, and our own deep depravity, in order to commend the grace of the gospel: but those who are most acquainted with the excellency of the law, and most diligently aim in every thing to obey it, will be most deeply conscious that the case is actually thus with them, whatever their opinion may be of those whom they suppose to be more eminent Christians. This opposition to sin, however, though in a measure unsuccessful; and this humiliating and distressing disappointment, respecting the object of their most ardent desires; must not be confounded with the willing slavery of sin, and the convenient excuse of in-dwelling depravity. The apostle "daily exercised himself to have a conscience void of offence towards God and man:" and could call others to witness, "how holily, and justly, and unblamably, he had behaved among them." Yet this was not inconsistent with his being deeply humbled in the sight of God, by the consciousness of wandering thoughts in prayer, want of fervour, of love and gratitude to God, of zeal for his glory, and of enlarged good-will to men; the rising of evil tempers, the intrusion of vain imaginations, and the intermixture of selfish motives. (Notes, Acts 24:10—21 v. 16. 1 Thes. 2:9—12.) All these are "sin," and as such hated and abhorred, in proportion to the degree of a man's sanctification: (Note, Ps. 119:113.) yet no mere man on earth, after all possible diligence, watchfulness, fasting, and prayer, could truly say, that, in these respects, he was perfectly free from sin, in his worship and obedience. So that, even the person who is not conscious of at any time neglecting one duty, or committing one actual transgression, in word or deed, (which is at least a most uncommon case,) yet aspiring to be holy as an angel, or as Jesus Christ was, will very painfully feel, that "he doeth not the things that he would;" and will "find a law, that when he would do good, evil is present with him:" and the more spiritual the services are in which he engages, the greater clog and hinderance will it be to him. Had the apostle intended to describe the case of any of those, however distinguished, who habitually live in sin, against the conviction of their own judgment and conscience; it cannot be conceived, that he would not, with his usual concise energy, have reprobated their conduct, as far more aggravated, than that of ignorant and thoughtless transgressors: but nothing of this kind appears; on the contrary, he leads on the character, which he is describing, to exultation and joy in believing. (Notes, 22—25. 8:1,2.)

To will. (18) Το θελειν. 19,21. Phil. 2:13.—Is present. Παρακειται. 21. Here only. Προκειται, 2 Cor. 8:12.—A law. (21) Τον νομον. 23,25. 8:2.—Men, in various respects, do those things voluntarily; which yet they are very reluctant to do, and perhaps previously had resolved not to do. 'Και γαρ εγω σοι δωκα εκων, ακοντι δε θυμῳ.' Homer. 'I indeed willingly gave unto thee, but with an unwilling mind.' This unwilling willingness pervades a great proportion of human actions. 'I really could not refuse him.'—'I could not, as I was circumstanced, do otherwise.' So that free-agency and responsibility still remain the same notwithstanding this "law, that when we would do good, evil is present with us."

V. 22—25. By "the inward man," the apostle must mean the soul as renewed by divine grace. He alone uses the term, and he uses it concerning believers only. (Notes, 2:25—29. 2 Cor. 4:13—18, v. 16. Eph. 3:14—19, v. 16.) The affections and faculties of the soul in fallen man, are more opposite to the law of God, than the bodily appetites; nay, the latter are not sinful, except as improperly gratified through the lusts of the heart. (Notes, 6:12,13,16—19. Gal. 5:16—21. Jam. 1:13—15.) But to approve, and even "delight in, the law of God," according to the habitual judgment and affections of the soul, through a kind of spiritual sympathy, or congeniality of heart with its most strict and holy requirements, must be peculiar to the regenerate; nay, it must imply a high degree of sanctification. This the apostle had attained to: yet he "found another law in his members," the constituent parts of the old man, (Notes, 6:5—7.) which continually enjoined a conduct, or suggested inclinations, contrary to "the law of his mind;" and this tended to "bring him into captivity to the law of sin," and in some cases for a time it produced that effect. This painful conflict was more grievous to him, than all his other trials: so that he was led to bemoan himself as "a wretched man," who was constrained, by a kind of necessity which he found it impossible to escape from, to be and to do what he most abhorred. This extorted a bitter complaint, which neither bonds, no, stripes, nor tortures, could have done; and, with a sort of holy impatience and eagerness, he exclaimed, "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?' (Notes, 8:18—23. 2 Cor. 12:7—10.) For the sin "which dwelt in him," clogged his motions, offended his senses, and was a nuisance to him as a spiritual man: even 24 O [n]wretched man that I am! [n]who shall deliver me from [o]the body of this death?

25 I [o]thank God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. [p]So then, with the mind I myself serve the law of God; but with the flesh the law of sin.

as if any one should be forced to drag about with him a putrifying corpse, as, by a refinement of cruelty, some have been sentenced to do. He found by experience that he could not deliver himself; and the law, instead of delivering him, seemed to make the case still worse: (Notes, 9—12. 8: 3,4.) but this made him the more fervently to thank God, for the method of salvation revealed through Jesus Christ; which gave him earnests and sure hopes of final and complete deliverance from this enemy, and a triumphant victory in this spiritual warfare.—"So then," says he, "I myself with my mind," (my prevailing judgment, affections, and purposes, as a regenerate man,) "serve and obey the law of God:" but with the flesh, the carnal nature, the remains of depravity, "I serve the law of sin," or that "law which wars against the law of my mind." Before conversion the whole man serves this law, with a very feeble opposition rom conscience, fear, and shame: but at length, the usurper is dethroned, and grace reigns in the heart. Yet still the usurper lurks in the kingdom, reigns over his own party, makes war, creates immense disturbance, and gains temporary advantages: but he is hated, opposed, proscribed, and shall die. (Note, Gal. 5:22—26.)—Delight in the law of God. (22) 'This is so sure a trace of real piety, and is represented in Scripture as in this view so decisive; that if it be susposed a true representation of a character, we must surely allow it to have been that of a truly good man.' Doddridge. It is especially spoken of Christ; and of the man after God's own heart as the type of him. (Notes, Ps. 40:6—8. 112:1. 119:47,48,92,97—100,111.) It is the effect of "the law being written in the heart;" and it is the direct opposite of "the carnal mind which is enmity against God; for that is not subject to the law of God, nor indeed can be." (Notes, 8:5—9. Jer. 31:31—34. Heb. 8:7—13. 10:5—18.) "Consenting to the law that it is good;" "delighting in" the holy, just, good, and spiritual law of God; hating all evil; loving all good; and being deeply distressed at not being able to do the good which is loved, are all exclusively peculiar to the regenerate, and widely different from a heathen's saying in one particular: 'I see and approve the better but follow the worse;' which in fact any man might say. 'Araspas' (in Xenophon) 'complains of two souls contending within him, which contains an agreeable illustration of this paragraph.' Doddridge. But in the case of Araspas, the conflict was between ambition and sensual indulgence, equally corrupt principles; not between "delight in the holy law of God," and the opposition of remaining depravity to earnest endeavours after perfect conformity to it. Indeed such a conflict as is here described, must exist where sin is hated, and "the law of God delighted in," till holiness is perfected. "Abhorrence of evil" must increase in proportion to the love of God and holiness; so that the least degree of evil rising in the heart, and escaping from the lips, in some passionate or vain word, will necessarily more grieve and burden an eminent saint, than perhaps the grossest crimes did before his conversion: even as a speck of dirt gives more uneasiness to a very cleanly person, than the most squalid filthiness does to those who are used to live in it as their element. (Note, Ez. 11:17—20.)—There is, therefore, no need to have recourse to such unnatural expedients in expounding this chapter, as to imagine, that when the apostle said, "I myself," he meant some other person of a widely different character; or the whole family of Abraham, before and under the law. However these theories have been sanctioned by eminent names, they go upon suppositions, for which the Scripture gives not the least ground: and which are wholly unprecedented and unparralleled, in the writings of any good author, sacred or profane. No doubt, numbers have perverted the words of the apostle: and it is fairly allowed, that no man who is not himself engaged in this conflict, can clearly understand his meaning, or fully enter into those feelings which dictated his energetic language. But, as to the former case, those who want an excuse for sin, "wrest the other Scriptures also to their own destruction:" (Note, 2 Pet. 3:14—16.) and as to the latter, "the secret of the LORD is with them that fear him;" and "the heart knoweth his own bitterness, and a stranger doth not intermeddle with his joy." (Notes, Ps. 25:14. Prov. 14:10.) It cannot be expected, that a man who never saw war, could enter into the feelings, and fully understand the ardent language, of an experienced soldier, when he related all his conflicts, dangers, hardships, terrors, narrow escapes, victories, and triumphs. But I apprehend, that many pious persons exclude themselves from the rich source of instruction and consolation, in their warfare provided for them in this chapter, either from fear lest others should pervert it to bad purposes; or because men of great name have affected to reprobate the evidently obvious interpretation, and have tried to force some other meaning upon the words, of which it is impossible they can admit. (Notes, Ps. 119:81—83,97—100,131,173—176.)

The mind to serve God must be a direct contrast to all these.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. We stand in such a relation to the holy law of God, as the rule of our present conduct and future judgment, that none but he who formed the union can dissolve it: and, unless "we become dead to the law by the body of Christ," renouncing all expectations from it, that we may be united to Him, who "died for our sins and rose again for our justification," we must inevitably abide under the dominion of sin and the curse of the law for ever.—If, however, we are thus delivered, it is not in order to our being "lawless;" (Note, 1 Cor. 9:19—23, v. 21.) but that the Spirit of Christ dwelling in us may write the law in our hearts, and enable us to bring forth the fruits of holy obedience, to the glory of God. Indeed this is absolutely necessary, in order to our serving God with that "newness of spirit," which the law itself demands; by enjoining "the love of God with the whole heart," and the "love of our neighbour as ourselves;" for sanctifying grace comes only by the new covenant, without which we fallen creatures must continue "in the flesh;" and our natural "concupiscence" will work against the law "to bring forth fruit unto death:" so that nothing more than a formal obedience to the outward letter of any precept, can be performed by us, without the renovating, new creating grace of the new covenant. (Notes, 2 Cor. 5:17. Eph. 2:4—10, v. 10.)

V. 7—13. It is not the fault of the holy law of God, that it cannot justify or sanctify a sinner: nay, it is the necessary effect of its perfection, by which it detects and condemns the least degree of evil, and leaves the transgressor to merited ruin without help or remedy: and the better the law is, the more righteous is the doom of those who break it. We should therefore be very careful while showing the impossibility of salvation by the law, to avoid all expressions which so much as seem derogatory to it. On the contrary, we ought to bear decided testimony to its equity, spirituality, and excellency; and show that it is, on that very account, suited to convince the sinner of the danger of his case, and even to render it still worse, so long as he foolishly cleaves to the law, and depends on it. For no man could expect to be either justified or sanctified by a broken law, or according to a forfeited covenant, were he not ignorant of the law, and of himself as compared with it; so that the proudest Pharisee on earth would from his towering height of vainconfidence, sink into despair; if the commandments of God were once discovered to his soul, in all their spirituality and excellency, without a correspondent view of the salvation of Christ. Ten thousand unobserved transgressions would stand in dread array against him; his former foibles and infirmities, as he thought them, would appear desperate rebellion, ingratitude, and enmity; his admired duties would appear loathsome, through pride, selfishness, and hypocrisy; and the dormant lusts of his heart, which secular motives or carnal hopes had restrained, would burst forth into enmity against God, disdain subjection to his law, "work in him all manner of concupiscence," and concur in slaying his hope and his soul. (Note, John 16:8—11.) Thus the law, which was "ordained unto life, would be found to be unto death:" through the deceitfulness of sin, and the unsuspected and desperate wickedness of his heart; "working death in him by that which was good," and making manifest its own "exceeding sinfulness." Thus a proper knowledge of the holy law of God is the twoedged sword, which gives the deathwound both to self-righteousness, and to antinomianism: for it is perfectly fit to be the rule of our duty, to be written in our hearts, and obeyed in our lives, for the very same reasons on account of which it cannot justify or save us.

V. 14—25. Every believer knows a little of the things spoken of by the apostle in these verses, when he first flees for refuge to the hope of the gospel: but his subsequent experience gives him still further insight into them. He is now in a measure "spiritual;" yet, in comparison with the spiritual requirements of the law, and the best desires of his heart, he must confess that he "is carnal and so'd under sin:" and he

CHAPTER VIII.

Those who are in Christ, and walk after the Spirit, are free from condemnation, 1—4. The carnal mind, and the spiritual mind distinguished, so that they only are the children of God, who have the Spirit of Christ, are "led by the Spirit," and mortify the flesh, 5—14. "The Spirit of adoption" testifies with their spirit, and marks them as children and heirs of God; though now exposed to suffering, 15—18. The creation through man's sin, is subject to vanity, and waits for deliverance at "the manifestation of the children of God," 19—22; who "groan being burdened," and are saved in hope, and patiently expect deliverance, 23—25; the Holy Spirit aiding their prayers, and thus rendering them acceptable, 26, 27. All things work together for the good of those who love God, as "called according to his purpose," which springs from their predestination to life, 28—31; and is secured by the death, resurrection, and intercession of Christ, 32—34. Nothing shall separate them from the love of God through Christ, 35—39.

THERE is therefore now [a]no condemnation to them which are [b]in Christ Jesus, [c]who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit.

groans under that clog and those fetters, which, as it were, chain him to the earth, and prevent him from mounting heavenward as he longs to do. "He consents to the law that it is good," yea, "he delights in it after the inward man:" he would do the good it requires; he allows of no violation of it; he wants no change in it, but longs to have his heart brought into a perfect conformity to it; he abhors all sin, and would serve God as angels do; he watches, prays, strives, and uses every means for this purpose: yet, after persevering in this course, perhaps during a long course of years, he finds that he cannot attain to perfection. (Note, Phil. 3:12—14.) Still he sins against his own allowance: he does what he hates, and longs to be preserved from: his will often changes, like the weathercock with the wind: that which on his knees he most ardently prayed against, and dreaded more than pain or death, in the hour of temptation he is betrayed into; his resolutions melt like the firm ice before the noonday sun, and he is counteracted in obeying the dictates of "the law of his mind," by "the law of sin," pervading both body and soul; so that he cannot perform that which he is most earnestly willing to do. (Notes, Matt. 26:30—35,40,41,69—75.) His views of the beauty of holiness and the excellency of the law, and of his own obligations to obedience, and his pantings after perfect purity, increase as "he grows in grace:" so that he seems further from the mark than ever, when at the height of his attainments in this present world. He is more deeply convinced as he proceeds, that "in him," as a fallen sinner, "dwelleth no good thing;" that, from depraved nature, evil alone can proceed; that the law can only condemn him; and that 'none but Jesus can do helpless sinners good.' This conflict sometimes renders him weary of life, and even impatient of living: he could be content to suffer, but he can scarcely bear the thought of continuing a self-abhorred sinner: he groans out frequently, "O wretched man, that I am!" while he drags about with him the detested "body of sin and death," from which he can obtain no deliverance: and did he not firmly trust in the mercy and grace of God through Jesus Christ, his case would be most deplorable. But, with this hope, prospect, and support, he manfully sustains the conflict; he rejoices amidst his humiliations; his groans and tears are mingled with hallelujahs, and his conscious guilt and depravity render the Redeemer's love, and complete salvation, doubly precious to his soul. His very anguish from such a source is the pledge of his felicity; having wrestled and prevailed for the blessing, and seen the face of Emmanuel in peace, he goes on his way halting. (P. O. Gen. 32: 13—32.) His complaints, yea, his unhallowed and deeply repented sins, are preparing him for singing more loudly and sweetly, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain:" and, like the dissonance attending on the tuning of a musical instrument, make way for more delightful melody: when patience shall have had its perfect work, and he shall have "overcome by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of his testimony." (Notes, 8:32—39. Rev. 7:13—17.) In the mean time, it shall be graciously pleaded in his behalf, that "it was not he, but sin that dwelt in him."—But, if a man speak on this subject with indifference or with satisfaction; if "sin dwelling in him" be the excuse for crimes committed, without remorse or godly sorrow; if he "allow the evil, and desire not the good," presuming that he has all things in Christ; if, instead of consenting to the goodness of the law, condemning himself, and loathing his sins, he depreciates the law and extenuates his own guilt; if his utmost willingness be to escape hell at any rate, without longing to be holy according to the spiritual and good law of God; if he do not "delight in it after the inward man," nor serve it with the prevailing desire of his mind, but willingly "serve the law of sin:" then doubtless he is "without Christ," whose name he profanes; he is under the law which he hates; and his presumptuous confidence and quietness only prove, that he is given over to "a strong delusion to believe a lie." Nor does this much-disputed and abused chapter more evidently condemn the hope of the proudest Pharisee on earth, than it does that of such a professor of evangelical truth.

NOTES.—CHAP. VIII. V. 1, 2. The apostle had shown that the believer, being earnestly desirous of obeying the holy law of God, was graciously accepted in Christ; and his failures were ascribed to "sin dwelling in him," against his habitual and prevalent inclination, and so not imputed to him; and he here proceeds more fully to state this privilege. (Notes, 7:15—25.) While men continue "under the law," as a covenant, every failure is imputed to them for condemnation: but when they "become dead to the law," and one with Christ, they are "in him" by faith, as their Refuge from day to day: and there is no condemnation for them. All their past sins are blotted out; they are fully justified; and, continually exercising repentance, and faith in his blood and righteousness, their lamented transgressions and deficiencies are pardoned. Thus they are preserved from condemnation, and shall be to the end and for ever. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, 32—39. 4:6—8. Is. 54:15—17. John 5:24—27. 10:26—31.) Their character and conduct likewise distinguish them: for, notwithstanding their painful conflict with in-dwelling sin, they do "not walk" after the dictates of corrupt nature, but are habitually influenced by the new principle, communicated in regeneration: for "that which is born of the Spirit, is spirit." (Marg. Ref. c.) Corrupt nature, "the sin which dwelleth in them," as "the law of sin and death," (Note, 7: 22—25.) once commanded their willing service; but regenerating grace, by "the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus," and by means of the gospel, has dethroned the usurper sin, and made them free from his law, by efficaciously inducing a contrary conduct. (Marg. Ref. e—g. Notes, 6:16—23. John 8:30—36. 2 Cor. 3:17,18.) So that, though the remaining power of sin greatly harasses them, and in some instances prevails; yet, on the whole, they are enabled successfully to resist its authority, and to "walk at liberty" in obedience to God's commandments.—Some explain "the law of the Spirit of life," of the doctrine of the gospel, through which the Spirit is communicated, rather than of his commanding influence in the believer's soul: but the latter is the more exact contrast to the "law of sin and death," from which he is by divine grace effectually set at liberty.—'To be in Christ,' says M. Le Clerc, 'is often used by St. Paul, for being a Christian: ... but if he means only Christians by profession, or by only being members of the Christian Church; this will by no means agree with this place, or any other of like nature: since freedom from condemnation and other benefits conferred on us by Jesus Christ, will not follow our being Christians in this sense; but upon a lively faith in Christ, our union to him by the Spirit, and our being so in him as to become new creatures. (9. 2 Cor. 5:17. Gal. 5:6.) ... The Spirit of Christ giving me a new life, is now another law, or rule of my actions, freeing me from the motions and power of sin, to which I was subject whilst under the law; and from the death to which that subjected me.' Whitby.—They who "are in Christ," are true Christians; "they walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit;" this describes their character: and it is their grand privilege, that "there is no condemnation for them." V. 3, 4. The good and perfect law of God was "weak through the flesh," or by means of man's depravity; so that it was "impossible" for it to bring man to holiness or liberty, any more than to justify him: even as the most salutary laws of the land cannot make men honest. They can only declare how they ought to act, and denounce penalties against transgressors: but they cannot change the heart; and therefore men's impetuous passions break through the feeble restraint, without regard to consequences, as the vehement torrent of a swollen river breaks through or overflows the mound which was placed to impede its course. therefore, the law was wholly inadequate to man's necessity; God was pleased, in infinite mercy, to send his own Son, to assume our nature, and appear "in the likeness of sinful flesh." Though free from sin, he became subject to those infirmities, to which through sin we are exposed; he was accused of many crimes, and "numbered with transgressors:" and he was punished by the Father, as our Surety, as if he had been the greatest of sinners. Thus he was appointed "for sin," or "for a sin-offering;" that God, having "condemned sin in the flesh," and shown his abhorrence of it, by the sufferings of his Son in our flesh, might pardon and justify the believer's person, and execute the sentence of condemnation on his corrupt nature, by its crucifixion and destruction: (Marg. Ref. i—l.) that, as the consequence of this, through his mercy and grace, even the very "righteousness" required by "the law," might be fully written in our hearts, and habitually, in all its parts, performed in our lives, though too imperfectly to justify us; and that, hereafter we might be perfectly conformed to the holy law, in its substantial requirement of perfect love to God and his creatures, and obey it fully for evermore. (Marg. Ref. n, o.)—Many expositors explain this of Christ, as One with his people, having fulfilled the righteousness of the law in their stead; and of its imputation to those, who walk after the Spirit. But the former sense seems more obvious, and best to answer the apostle's design; who was proving, that deliverance from the law as a covenant was necessary, in order to our obeying the law as a rule. (Notes, 7:5,6. Gal. 2:17—21.) 'Sanctification begun in us, is the sure evidence of our union with Christ; which is the richest fruit of a holy life.' Beza.—The completion, however, of sanctification seems especially intended. (Notes, Eph. 5:22—27. Col. 1:21—23. Jude 22—25.)

V. 5—9. The discrimination of character, before referred to, is here more fully stated. "The flesh," in this connexion, cannot mean the body, as opposed to the soul: for "out of man's heart proceed adulteries, fornications, and drunkenness;" and, on the other hand, "pride, envy, hatred, are works of the flesh." (Marg. Ref. o. Notes, Matt. 15:15—20. Gal. 5:19—21.) That wickedness, the seat of which is immediately in the soul, is more contrary to the image and glory of God, than that in which the body seems more concerned: but indeed the body is no more than the instrument, and the soul is the agent, in every sin. (Note, 6:12,13.) The soul of an ungodly man is not "spiritual" but carnal; "that which is born of the flesh is flesh." (Note, John 3:6.) By "the flesh" we must, therefore, understand corrupt nature, as derived from Adam to all his posterity: and perhaps this term is used, because the soul is become the caterer to man's animal appetites, as well as depraved in all other respects; so that the whole man is, as it were, immersed and sunk in the flesh. They therefore, who are "born after the flesh," but not "after the Spirit," and who go after the leadings of the flesh, "mind the things of the flesh:" they are sagacious about them; they choose, desire, pursue, savour, and delight in them: they seek their happiness in the riches, pleasures, honours, and perishing vanities of the world; or in things of an unholy nature, or in things which must be left at death, and which bear no relation to heavenly felicity. About these, their abilities, imaginations, contrivance, and time are employed; and they give them a decided preference to "spiritual things," in their habitual judgment and conduct. But those who are "born of the Spirit," and walk after the leadings of the new and spiritual nature, understand, choose, pursue, relish, and supremely value such things as pertain to the spiritual and divine life, and such as will endure for ever. The favour of God, communion with him, renewal to his image, and a life spent to his glory, chiefly occupy their imaginations, desires, plans, and pursuits; and have the pre-eminent place in their choice and conduct, notwithstanding all the opposition from in-dwelling sin. (Marg. Ref. p, q. Notes, 1,2. 2 Cor. 4:13—18. Col. 3:1—4.) This habitual prevalence stamps the character, as carnal or spiritual; so that, if a man be "carnal," in the prevailing judgment, temper, and affections of his mind, he is under condemnation, dead in sin, and meet for destruction: but if he be "spiritual," in the habitual, prevailing temper of his soul, he is evidently alive to God, and at peace with him; and the spiritual mind is, in proportion as it prevails, the very essence of life and peace. (Marg. Ref. r. Note, 7:13,14.) The importance of this distinction is manifest, "because the carnal mind is enmity against God:" man's apostacy originated in his preferring the satisfaction to be found in the creatures through disobedience, to the felicity to be enjoyed in God by obedience. This is in fact the universal idolatry: and men thus preferring self-satisfaction, and created good, to the favour and service of God, not only rebel against him, but become enemies to him, and "haters" of him. For his holy law demanding their whole heart, and forbidding their favourite pursuits; and all his perfections being engaged to execute vengeance on transgressors; "the carnal mind," disdaining control, being wholly averse from the service of God, and bent on sinful indulgence, rises in enmity against his authority, precepts, threatenings, power, and perfections. Therefore, "the carnal mind is not subject to the divine law, and indeed cannot be;" it is morally unable to do any thing but revolt against it, and refuse obedience to it. (Marg. Ref. t—x. Notes, 7:7—12.) An enemy may be reconciled, a carnal man may become spiritual; but "enmity" in the abstract cannot be reconciled, and therefore the carnal mind must be crucified and destroyed: (Notes, 6:5—7. Gal. 5:22—26.) and, as no rational creature of God can please him, who refuses subjection to the holy law; it is evident, that unregenerate men "cannot please God," in any of their services, by whatever name they are called. Thus evangelical religion is equally remote from self-righteousness, which cleaves to the law as a covenant: and to antinomianism, which rejects it as a rule: for, not being subject to the law, men "cannot please God." (Marg. Ref. y, z.)—"But," says the apostle, "Ye are not in the flesh, but in the spirit," regenerate and spiritual, and therefore willingly, though not perfectly, subject to the law, "if so be, the Spirit of God dwell in you:" but if any man, Jew, Gentile, or nominal Christian, remain destitute of the sanctifying Spirit of Christ, he certainly does not belong to him, as one of his accepted disciples, and, dying in that state, he must perish as an enemy of God. (Marg. Ref. c, d.)—If "the flesh" be explained of the body, as distinguished from the soul, or spirit; it follows, beyond all doubt or evasion, that no man can "please God," while he lives in this world; and also that the Romans were disembodied spirits, which is palpably absurd; yet the interpretation of other Scriptures, concerning the flesh and spirit, by many learned men, unavoidably leads to this absurdity. Nor is it less unreasonable and unscriptural to aver, that living under the Mosaic dispensation was "being in the flesh;" and professing the gospel, especially if miraculous powers were vouchsafed, was being in the spirit. (Notes, Matt. 7:21—23. 1 Cor. 13:1—3.) Yet these seem the only ways by which the above plain and natural interpretation can possibly be evaded. (Notes, John 6:52—58. 14:15—17,21—24. 17:20—23. 2 Cor. 13:5,6.)

V. 10, 11. (Note, 5—9.) If the "Spirit of Christ dwell" in a man, "Christ" himself is "in him," by his power and influence, and by his image renewed in him. In this case though the body is mortal, and must soon die, because of the disobedience of Adam, and the man's personal transgressions: yet "the spirit is life," has life abiding in it, the soul is alive to God; and has begun its holy felicity, which shall endure for ever, through "the righteousness" of the second Adam in whom it is interested. So that when the body drops into the dust, the soul, being perfectly delivered from sin, will enter heaven: and the almighty God, who raised Jesus from the dead, will raise the mortal body also, incorruptible and glorious, by the omnipotence of his in-dwelling Spirit, who will not finally leave his temple mouldering in the dust. (Marg. Ref. Notes, 3,4. John 4:10—15, v. 14. 11:20—27, vv. 26,27. 2 Cor. 4:13—18. 5:5—8. Phil. 1:21—26. 3:20, 21. 1 Thes. 4:13—18. 1 Pet. 3:17,18.) Then sin and all its effects will be for ever done with. (Note, 1 Cor. 15:50 —54.) Several readers may be aware, that another interpretation has been given of these verses, especially by the celebrated Mr Locke, who explains quickening the mortal body, by sanctifying the immortal soul! But the various, and often absurd and unnatural interpretations, given to several passages in these chapters by some eminently learned men, would require far more time and room particularly to notice them, and make remarks on them, than the nature of this publication can admit of. In general, when the interpretation is plausible, and supported by probable reasons, the author thinks it incumbent on him to notice it, in one way or other: but when, on careful investigation, it appears to him, that this is not the case: he is contented to pass it over in silence. He believes, that few, who have impartially considered the subject, will refuse to join him in the following verdict, concerning Mr. Locke's interpretation: 'He hath said nothing of weight against this sense.' Whithy. That is, against the sense above given of the passage.—In no book, which the author has read, does the pride of human reason opposing the express testimonies of God, and striving to wrest them from their obvious meaning, appear so prominent, as in most parts of the great Mr. Locke's exposition of St. Paul's epistles.

V. 12, 13. As death and all misery originated from man's preferring his own inclinations to the will of God; and as all felicity is communicated by the renewal of the soul to holiness; so Christians should not consider themselves to be "debtors to the flesh," though it still lives and works in them. They have already ruined themselves by complying with its suggestions; and they can owe it nothing now that Christ has rescued them from merited destruction. (Marg. Ref. n.) But we thus become debtors to an immense amount unto him and his grace. Our debt of sin as paid, by the death of Christ on the cross for us, and so freely pardoned to us, becomes a debt of grateful love: and our past neglect and sin render us the more indispensably bound to do what we possibly can for his glory, the good of our brethren, and of our own souls also. For indeed, if any habitually live according to its corrupt lustings, they will certainly perish in their sins, notwithstanding their profession of the gospel; but, on the other hand, if, through the influences of "the Holy Spirit," and according to the tendency of the new nature, they deny, subdue, and proceed to extirpate their sinful lusts; and so to mortify those inclinations and affections which thence arise, they prove themselves "alive to God through Christ," and their spiritual life will abound till perfected in eternal happiness. (Marg. Ref. o, p. Note, 6:21—23.)—The natural appetites of the body need only to be moderated, regulated, and subordinated; but the carnal desires "of the body of sin and death," the "old Adam," "the flesh with its affections and lusts," must be extirpated, and all its actings terminated. (Notes, 6:5—7. 7:22—25. 1 Cor. 9:24—27. Col. 2:11,12. Pet. 2:11.) This must be done by the Holy Spirit working in us both "to will" and "to do," what God commands; (Note, Phil. 2:12,13.) yet we are to do it through him, and by dependence on him, which is energetically enforced by the words: "If ye, through the Spirit, &c." V. 14—17. Regeneration by the Holy Spirit prepares the heart for receiving Christ by living faith; and communicates a new and divine life to the soul, though in a feeble state, as that of "a new-born babe:" (Note, 1 Pet. 2:1—3, v. 2.) Believing in Christ, we become "the children of God" by adoption also. (Notes, John 1:10—13. Gal. 3:26—29.) Therefore all they, and they only, who are led by the Spirit, are "the children of God." (Marg. Ref. r, s. Note, Gal. 5:16—18.) The Holy Spirit leads a man into the knowledge of God in Christ Jesus, and of his own heart; into humble repentance, faith in Christ, holy love, communion with God, and delight in his worship and commandments: on the other hand, he leads him away from vanity and iniquity, from vice and ungodliness, from pride and discord: (Note, Ps. 143:8—10.) and in proportion as we willingly give up ourselves to be led in the paths of truth and holiness, we may know our adoption.—The apostle further observed, that he and his brethren at Rome had not received again "the spirit of bondage," to serve God from slavish fear; for this all must do, who continue under the law as a covenant if they attempt to serve him at all. The Mosaic dispensation had a greater tendency to foster this temper, than the Christian religion has: and the Jews, too generally, considering the whole as a covenant of works, worship God in this slavish manner. But the greater number of the Roman converts had never been under the Mosaic law; yet they are spoken of indiscriminately, as having been formerly influenced by "the spirit of bondage:" we may therefore suppose, that those convictions were also intended, under which awakened sinners, even if in consequence converted, act more from fear and selfish principles, than established believers do; abstaining from many sins through dread of consequences, without decidedly hating them; and practising duties without loving them. These convictions indeed proceed from the moving of the Spirit of God upon their minds, and prepare them for receiving Christ by faith: but they are very different from the disposition, and state of mind and heart, of those who are brought into the full light and liberty of the gospel, and have received "the Spirit of adoption." (Marg. Ref. t, u. Notes, Num. 17:12,13. Matt. 25:24—30. John 16:8—11,14,15. Gal. 4:4—7,21—31. Eph. 1:13,14. 2 Tim. 1:6—8. 1 John 4:18.) Then they are taught and animated to "serve God" with filial reverence, confidence, love, gratitude, submission, zeal, and admiring, adoring complacency; and are especially encouraged and emboldened to call upon him as "a Father," for all things which they want, and for support and deliverance under all their trials, notwithstanding their conscious unworthiness. The word "Abba," is Syriac for "Father:" and the use of different languages, in this connexion, sweetly indicates the harmony of Jews and Gentiles, and of different nations, in this filial worship of God according to the gospel. (Marg. Ref. x. Notes, Matt. 6:6,9. Mark 14:36. Gal. 4—7.) Thus the Holy Spirit, by producing in believers the affections which dutiful children bear to a wise and good father, in their habitual state of heart toward God, most manifestly attests their adoption into his family. This is not done by a voice, or immediate revelation, or impulse, or merely by a text brought to the mind; (for all these things are equivocal and delusory;) but by "bearing witness with their spirits," or coinciding with the testimony of their own enlightened minds and consciences, as to their uprightness in embracing the gospel, and giving themselves up to the service of God. (Note, 2 Cor. 1:12—14, v. 12.) So that, while they are examining themselves concerning the reality of their conversion, and find scriptural evidence of it: the Holy Spirit, from time to time, shines on his own work, excites their holy affections into lively exercise, renders them very efficacious upon their conduct, and thus puts the matter beyond doubt: for while they feel the spirit of dutiful children towards God, as described in his holy word, they become satisfied concerning his paternal love to them. Note, 9:1—3.) So that, this "witness of the Spirit" is borne along with that of our own consciences, not without it, nor against it: and it coincides with the testimony of the Holy Spirit, in the Scripture, and must be proved and assayed by it. (Marg. Ref. y, z.) But this being clearly ascertained, we may confidently regard ourselves as the heirs of the heavenly inheritance, (for "if children, then heirs") and of God himself as our Portion; even "joint heirs with Christ," the beloved Son of the Father, being accepted in him, and appointed with him to share the glorious inheritance: (Note•

18 For [d] I reckon, that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with [e] the glory which shall be revealed in us.

19 For [f] the earnest [g] expectation of the creature waiteth for [h] the manifestation of the sons of God.

20 For [i] the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope;

21 Because the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, [k] into the glorious liberty of the children of God.

22 For we know that [l] the whole creation groaneth and [l] travaileth in pain together until now:

23 And not only they, but ourselves also, [m] which have the first-fruits of the Spirit, [n] even we ourselves groan within ourselves, [o] waiting for the adoption, to wit, [p] the redemption of our body.

24 For we are [q] saved by hope. [r] But hope tha is seen is not hope: for what a man seeth, wh doth he yet hope for?

25 But if we hope for that we see not, then do we [s] with patience wait for it.

26 Likewise the Spirit also helpeth our [t] in firmities: [u] for we know not what we should pray for as we ought: [x] but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us, [y] with groanings which cannot be uttered.

27 And [z] he that searcheth the hearts [a] knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, [b] because he maketh intercession for the saints [c] according to the will of God. [Practical Observations.]

V. 18—23. The apostle experienced an abundant measure of the sufferings of Christ: (Notes, Col. 1:24. 2 Tim. 2:8—13.) but, upon the most exact and deliberate computation of them, he found them "not worthy to be compared" with that glorious recompense, which will be bestowed on Christians, or "that glory which will be revealed" to them, and accomplished in them. So that it would be the greatest folly imaginable for him to shrink from the pursuit of this promised felicity, through the dread of the most terrible of these transient sufferings. (Marg. Ref. d, e. Notes, 5:3—5. 2 Cor. 4:8—18. 6:3—10.)—Indeed the whole visible creation seems to "wait," with earnest expectation, for that important period, when the "children of God shall be manifested," in the glory which is prepared for them: and in this, it resembles a man, who, with outstretched neck, looks, and waits with impatient longing, for the arrival of some beloved and expected friend. (Marg. Ref. f—h.) For "the creation itself was made subject to vanity" and disorder through man's apostacy: "not willingly," but by a kind of constraint, through the guilt and righteous condemnation of Adam and his posterity. By this awful dispensation, the Lord subjected the creatures of this lower world, and even the visible creation, to vanity. Every thing seems perverted from its intended use: the inanimate creatures are pressed into the service of man's rebellion; the luminaries of heaven give him light, by which to work wickedness: the fruits of the earth are sacrificed to his luxury, intemperance, and ostentation; its bowels are ransacked for metals, from which arms are forged for public and private murder and revenge; or to gratify man's avarice, and excite him to fraud, oppression, and war. The animal tribes are subject to pain and death through man's sin: and their sufferings are exceedingly increased by his cruelty, who, instead of a kind master, is become their inhuman butcher and tyrant. Above all, nearly every part of the creation has been and is perverted, in one way or other, to idolatry, which is especially "vanity." (Note, 1:21—23.) The heavenly luminaries, the earth, rivers, woods, and mountains, as well as animals, have been adored as gods; while metals, stone, and wood, have been fashioned into idols, and decorations of idols; and all the prime of the productions of the earth have been offered in sacrifice unto them. So that, every thing is in an unnatural state: the good creatures of God appear evil, through man's abuse of them; and even the enjoyment originally to be found in them, is turned into vexation, bitterness, and disappointment, by man's idolatrous love of them and expectation from them. Yet this otherwise most deplorable state of the creation is "in hope:" God intends to rescue it from this confused state, and to deliver it from being thus "held in bondage" to man's depravity; that it may partake of "the glorious liberty of his children," and minister to it. Thus we are assured, that "the whole creation groans" in every part, as with one sympathizing expression of anguish, (like a woman in the pains of travail, not as one in the agonies of death,) expecting and impatiently longing for a glorious event of all these distractions. This it has done ever since the fall, and will do, in a measure, till the end of the world. The miseries also of the human species, through their own and each other's wickedness, as well as the state of the inferior creatures, declare the world to be in such a situation, as is not intended always to continue. (Marg. Ref. i—l.) Nay, not only do all creatures, and all other men here below, as it were, groan under the burdens imposed on them through sin: but even "the children of God," who have "the Spirit of adoption," and his holy consolations, as the first-fruits and pledge of their everlasting felicity, (Note, 14—17.) yet groan within themselves, through manifold pains, conflicts, temptations, and difficulties: and especially through the disquietude of in-dwelling sin; (Notes, 7:22—25. 2 Cor. 5:1—8.) and in "waiting for the adoption," their public admission into the family of God, and to the enjoyment of their inheritance: at that season, when their bodies also shall be redeemed from the grave, incorruptible, immortal, and glorious. (Marg. Ref. m—p. Note, 1 Cor. 15:50—54.) Then Satan, sin, death, misery, and all wicked creatures, will be confined to hell; and the rest of God's creation will appear glorious, pure, beautiful, orderly, and happy; in every respect answering the end for which it was formed, and in nothing abused to contrary purposes. (Notes, Rev. 20:11—15. 21:1—4.)—The sufferings of animals, though very many and grievous, yet being unfeared and transient, are doubtless overbalanced by their enjoyments, and to infer an individual resurrection of all or any of them, from this passage, is surely one of the wildest reveries, which ever entered into the mind of a thinking man.—The happy effects produced by the gospel, when extensively successful even in this present world, may be considered as earnests of the glorious scene, of which the apostle speaks; (Note, Rev. 20:4—6.) but "the manifestation of the sons of God," (19) and "the adoption, to wit, the redemption of the body," (23) clearly show that the general resurrection, and the state which follows, were especially, and indeed exclusively meant; for then only will "the children of God be manifested" as such, and be separated from all others. V. 24—27. True believers are saved "by," or in, "hope:" they have been actually brought into a state of safety; but their comfort consists "in hope," rather than fruition. Now that which is the object of sight, sense, or enjoyment, cannot properly be called "hope:" for how can a man be said to hope for the vision or fruition of that which he at present beholds and enjoys? The future felicity of the saints will chiefly consist in beholding the manifested glory of God; some glimpses by faith they here "see as in a glass darkly;" for the full vision and fruition of his glory they hope, and wait, in reliance on his promise, and "by patient continuance in well-doing," amidst manifold trials and temptations: and from this hope they cannot be diverted, by the vain expectation of finding satisfaction in the things of time and sense. (Marg. Ref. q—s. Notes, 5:3—5. 1 Pet. 1:3—5.) For, though their infirmities are many and great, and they would soon be overpowered if left to themselves; yet the Spirit of God so helps them, and supports them, and so powerfully aids their exertions feeble and infirm in themselves, that they are not entirely overcome. Indeed, as their strength and comfort, amid conflicts, must be obtained by prayer, and as they are so ignorant, forgetful, or unbelieving, that they know not what to ask for, or how to ask for any thing in a proper manner, and with proper affections; the same Spirit compassionately assists their memories, excites their desires and hopes, and increases their faith. Thus he becomes an inward "Intercessor," by teaching them to offer such prayers, as are pleasing to God, and meet to be accepted through their heavenly Advocate. (Marg. Ref. t, u. Notes, Ps. 37:4. Jam. 5:16—18. 1 John 5:14,15. Jude 20,21.) These prayers do not so much consist in copious and fluent expressions, which are often destitute of suitable affections; but in deep acquaintance with their own wants and miseries, earnest longings after spiritual blessings, and believing expectations of them, which are sometimes productive rather "of groans" than of words: or they are uttered in broken sentences and detached and earnest ejaculations, rather than a continued prayer; or they are larger than any words, however suitable, can express; as implying more than a man can find words to utter.—Perhaps the humble, broken-hearted supplicant, when thus groaning out his desires after pardon and deliverance from sin, is ashamed to offer such incoherent requests: but the heart-searching God well understands and approves this energetic language; which expresses "the mind of the Spirit," when making intercession for the saints, in whom he dwells; according to the will of God, both in his promise, commandment, and providence; and such prayers will surely be answered, when the well-worded addresses of formalists will be rejected. (Marg. Ref. x, y.)—Mind of, &c.] 'The phrase is here ... the very same that was used in the sixth verse; and expresses, not merely the meaning, but the temper and disposition, of the mind, as under the influences of the divine Spirit, pursuing and breathing after such blessings, as suit its rational and immortal nature.' Doddridge. (Notes, 5—9. Eph. 6:18—20, v. 18.)—The clause in one of the collects of our liturgy, seems well to express this: 'That they may love the thing which thou commandest, and desire that which thou dost promise.' When the Holy Spirit produces this state of the judgment and affections; the prayers which spring from it, will be graciously accepted through our heavenly Advocate by the holy heart-searching God. (Marg. Ref. z—c.)

V. 28—31. From the preceding considerations, the apostle assuredly concluded, that all events, in life or death, concurred in promoting the eternal good of every true believer, however bitter and painful they might at present be: for nothing could ever defeat the grea end proposed in all the dispensations of God respecting them, even their everlasting salvation.—Providential appointments are doubtless primarily intended: but as these often lead men into temptation, and so prove occasions of sin, we could have no assurance that they would "all work together for good," if we were absolutely to except the effects of our own sin and folly. (Note, Gen. 22:1.) The sins, indeed, even of true believers, are not always overruled for their increase of present grace, or of future glory; in this respect they "suffer loss, and are saved as by fire:" (Note, 1 Cor. 3:10—15.) yet the whole concurs, as one complex plan, to prepare them for the inheritance intended for them; and many of their own mistakes and miscarriages, being deeply repented of, work together eminently for their humiliation, and the increase of their grateful love. (Marg. Ref. d, e. Notes, 2 Chr. 32:24—33. Matt. 26:69—75. 2 Cor. 12:7—10. P. O. 1—10.) As far as they act in character, and live in the habitual exercise of "love to God," all things concur in augmenting their final recompense. When they act out of character, corrections, and perhaps terrors, will be employed to bring them back again: and if a man allow himself in sin, expecting to derive good from it, he "does evil that good may come," he "sins on that grace may abound," he bears the broad mark of a hypocrite, and "his damnation will be just." So that we need not invalidate this animating assurance, to guard it from the perversion of wicked men, as some have done, to the great discouragement of humble Christians; who fear nothing so much by far, even in their sharpest afflictions, as their own lamented propensity to sin. (Note, John 10:26—31.)—The persons intended once did not "love God;" (Notes, 5—9. 5:7—10.) but they had been "called" into a state of reconciliation and love to him, "according to his purpose" and choice of them, which he will never suffer to be frustrated. Having in his infinite, but incomprehensible wisdom and righteousness, permitted the fall and apostacy of man; he looked upon the whole human species as deserving of destruction, and meet for it: yet, purposing to provide and reveal a gracious salvation to them, for the glory of his name, he knew that they would as certainly reject this salvation, as they would break his holy law. For reasons therefore not revealed to us, he determined to leave some deservedly to perish in obstinate enmity; and graciously to recover others by regeneration and efficacious grace. These "he foreknew," not merely in respect of external privileges, or as a part of favoured nations, but as individually chosen to eternal life: for in consequence of this foreknowledge, "he predestinated," or before decreed, them "to be conformed to the image of his son." (Marg. Ref. f—h. Note, Acts 2:22—24.) In this life they are in part renewed to his holy image, and walk in his steps; and, having passed, like Jesus, through many sufferings, they will hereafter be completely conformed to his holy human nature, both in body and soul: that so he may appear among them as "the first begotten," and Head "of the many brethren," which shall constitute the family of God; that, being admitted through him to be children and heirs, they may thus be made meet with him to enjoy their inheritance. (Note, 15—17.) As this was the "determined purpose and foreknowledge of God" respecting them; so all the intermediate steps were equally predetermined. Thus the Lord "calls" to repentance, faith in Christ, and newness of life, every one whom he has "predestinated;" he "justifies," through the righteousness of Christ, every one whom he "calls;" and he will finally "glorify" every one whom he "justifies." (Marg. Ref. g—n.)—Sanctification is not expressly mentioned in this golden chain: but "predestination to be conformed to the image" of Christ, effectual calling, and final glory, so describe the beginning, the progress, and the consummation of sanctification, that no omission can in this respect be imputed to the apostle. In the language of faith and hope, he speaks of the whole work as already done, because ensured by the purposes and promises of God; and he demands what can be said unto, or against, such things. For if God be thus "for us," freely and absolutely, our unchangeable Friend, and thus determined to bless us with everlasting felicity; who or what can be so against us, as to defeat his gracious purpose? Or what need have we to fear the rage and power of all creatures, if they should combine against us? (Marg. Ref. o, p.)—From this and similar passages, some persons have absurdly spoken of our having been justified from eternity, &c. but the fixed intention of doing any thing, is perfectly distinct from the actual performance of it. God as absolutely determined the final glorification of every believer, as he did the justification of every elect person: we might then as well say, they have been glorified in body and soul from all eternity: this could not be more absurd or unscriptural, than the notion of being justified from eternity; and probably it would be less capable of perversion. Dr. Whitby says, that all the fathers, before Augustine, understood this passage 'of those, whom God foresaw would love him.' But does God foresee that any of our race, while unregenerate, will love him? (Note, Eph. 1:3—8.) And is not the clause, "called according to his purpose," of the same import as regenerated? And can this choice of some, rather than others, of our fallen race, because of something spiritually good in them, as the ground of it, in order to their being thus "called," possibly consist with the doctrines of original sin, or the total depravity of human nature, and of a regeneration from the death of sin to the life of righteousness? Does it not border on Pelagianism? This, however, gives up the notion of a national election being intended. Indeed, if all the Gentiles, or all the inhabitants of any one nation, whom God foreknew, and determined to call into his church, be actually "conformed to the image of Christ," and "justified," and shall, without exception, partake of eternal glory; the interpretation of the passage, as referring to the election of collective bodies, may stand; but otherwise it cannot. So that, if this were the only passage, in which the humiliating subject was expressly mentioned; we might confidently maintain, that the doctrine of individual predestination to eternal life, and the authority of the apostle as an inspired writer, must stand or fall together. Nothing more fully shows this, than the difficulties to which its very learned and sagacious opposers are reduced; and the different and discordant grounds on which they rest their cause: for they scarcely agree in any thing, but in determining to oppose the most natural and obvious meaning of the words. Perhaps the apostle's doctrine was never more justly expressed by any uninspired writer, than in the former part of the seventeenth article of our church. 'Predestination unto life, is the everlasting purpose of God, whereby (before the foundations of the world were laid) he hath constantly decreed by his counsel, secret to us, to deliver from curse and damnation those whom he hath chosen in Christ out of mankind; and to bring them by Christ to everlasting salvation, as vessels made to honour. Wherefore they which he endued with so excellent a benefit of God, be called according to God's purpose, by his Spirit working in due season; they through grace obey the calling; they be justified freely; they be made the sons of God by adoption; they be made like the image of his only begotten Son Jesus Christ; they walk religiously in good works, and at length by God's mercy, they attain to everlasting felicity.'—Love God, &c. V. 32—34. The omnipotence and omniscience of God had been, in the preceding verse, opposed to the puny efforts of every enemy: here, his former benefits are shown to be assured pledges of final felicity, to all real Christians. The holiness of God and man's sinfulness seemed to bar the way to man's happiness; but the free love of God to them, when rebels and enemies, induced him to "give his own Son" to be their Surety and Sacrifice, who willingly assumed their nature, in order to bear their sins: and in this, the Father "spared him not, but delivered him up" to agony, ignominy, and death, notwithstanding his personal dignity and excellency, the perfection of his obedience, and his own inconceivable love of him. (Marg. Ref. q, r. Notes, 5:6—10. Is. 53:7—10. 2 Pet. 2:4—9.) Thus he bore the curse in the stead of all his people, and so expiated their guilt, even when they were enemies: and having, in virtue of that atonement, and his own eternal choice, called them into a state of peace with him, and taught them to love and obey him; how can it be supposed, that he will now withhold any thing from them? (Marg. Ref. s. Notes, Ps. 84:11,12. 1 Cor. 3:18—23. Eph. 3:20,21.) All things in heaven and earth, the universal creation, yea, the everlasting enjoyment of the Creator himself as their Portion, are not so great a display of his free love to them, as the gift of his coequal Son to be the atonement on the cross for their sins; and all the rest necessarily follows upon their union with him, and interest in him. (Note, John 3:16.) The emphasis is evidently here laid, not on Christ as incarnate, being given up to death for us; but in God's giving his own Son to become incarnate for such a purpose. (Note, John 5:17,18.)—Who then "can lay any thing to the charge of God's elect;" to the charge of those whose election is manifested, by their being called to the fellowship of Christ? when it is God, against whom they have sinned, who has at such a price completely justified them? (Marg. Ref. t—x. Note, 1, 2. Is. 50:7—9. 54:15—17.) Satan may accuse them, the world may revile them, their brethren may suspect and censure them, their own consciences may reproach them with many sins; the law may convict and condemn them for many former and later transgressions: but God himself pleads their cause; he pronounces them righteous, silences their accusers, pacifies their consciences, clears their characters, and shows the law magnified, and justice satisfied, in the obedience and sufferings of their Surety: and who then can make good any charge against them? (Note, Zech. 3:1—4.) If they look forward to the day of judgment; who shall then condemn them? The Judge himself will be the same Person who loved them, died for their sins, and rose again for their justification: (Note, 4:23—25.) and who now at the right hand of the Father ever liveth to plead in their behalf, and to exert his almighty power for their benefit! Even now, he presents their services for acceptance before his Father's throne; he quashes all accusations brought against them, he defeats the machinations of their enemies; he manages all things for their good, and is perfecting his work in them: and will he then forsake the work of his own hands, and at last condemn them to hell? It is impossible! (Marg. Ref. y—b. Notes, Is. 54:6—10,15—17. Luke 22:31—34, v. 32. John 17:1—3. 2 Thes. 2:13,14. Heb. 7:23—25.)

V. 35—39. As infinite and unchangeable power and love are engaged in behalf of all believers, and the mercy already shown them is greater than all that which is further needful; they may even triumph on the field of battle, and exult amidst their conflicts and groans: for "who shall separate them from the love of Christ," who has chosen, redeemed, called, and justified them? Shall trials, persecutions, or calamities of any kind, degree, or continuance? Shall the sword of war, or that of the executioner? Indeed it had been written of old, that the harmless people of God were, and would be, butchered like sheep. (Marg. Ref. c—f. Notes, 5:6—10. Ps. 44:17—22. John 16:1—3. Eph. 3:14—19, vv. 18,19.) But, instead of being separated from his love by these events, they would be brought to the more complete enjoyment of it: and so not only escape unhurt, or barely come off victorious; but they would also be made "more than conquerors," even immense gainers, by their sufferings, through the supporting grace of their loving Saviour. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Notes, 2 Chr. 20:22—25. 32:27—29.) Indeed, the apostle was fully "persuaded," or assured, that neither the love of life, nor its snares and trials, nor the fear, agony, or separating stroke of death in any form, nor the machinations of evil angels, or of all the principalities and powers of darkness, or the ungodly persecuting princes of this world; nor any present calamities, or future unknown changes or undiscovered scenes; neither the height of prosperity, nor the depth of adversity; neither the highest created power, nor the deepest plots of subtle enemies; nor any creature, nor all creatures, shall ever prevail to separate true believers "from the love of God in Christ Jesus" towards them: as his purposes are unchangeable, his engagements irrevocable, and his power invincible. (Marg. Ref. i—q. Note, 1 Cor. 3:18—23.)—It is frivolous to say, that sin, being no creature of God, may separate the believer from his love, notwithstanding all this: for such a restriction wholly invalidates the passage. Tribulation, persecution, the terror of death, the frowns or smiles of the world, and the machinations of evil spirits, have not the smallest tendency to "separate us from the love of God," except as they prove occasions of sin. Professed believers in such circumstances often forsake God and perish; but "all his saints are in his hand," and "are kept by his power through faith unto salvation:" so that they either [illegible]sist and overcome every temptation; or if baffled and foiled, they are brought back by convictions and corrections, with penitent tears and fervent supplications; and they dread suffering, chiefly because they fear lest it should prove the occasion of in-dwelling sin gaining some victory over them. (Notes, Luke 22:31—34. John 10:26—31. 1 Pet. 1:3—5.)—If a man take encouragement to sin from such assurances, he renders it extremely probable that he has no interest in them: no one can triumph on this ground, who has not scriptural evidence of his conversion and his love to God; (Note, 28—31.) or take the warrantable comfort of them, except he is, at present, striving against sin, and harassed by fears lest some future event should give that detested and dreaded foe, a fatal advantage over him. We must not therefore take the cordials from the weary and almost fainting combatants; because others unwarrantably seize upon them, and fatally intoxicate themselves with them.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9. The terrors of the law, and our own consciousness of guilt and in-dwelling sin, should endear to us the free salvation of the gospel; and urge us to flee for refuge to Christ, that we may be safe in him, as Noah was in the ark, when threatened destruction shall overwhelm all ungodly men.—While we earnestly desire to be delivered from condemnation, let us seek for grace to enable us "to walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit:" thus it will be evident, that "the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, hath made us free from the law of sin and death," and that the grace of the gospel has already done far more towards our sanctification, than the law could possibly ever do for those, who desired to be under it. For if we truly rely on the sacrifice of the Son of God, "in the likeness of sinful flesh," for our sins; we shall find that our old nature is condemned and must be crucified; we shall heartily concur in putting this sentence in execution; and long for "the righteousness of the law to be fulfilled in us," even as it was by our Surety. Of this, our present habitual "walk after the Spirit" is an earnest and sure pledge. But "the carnal mind" and conversation are evidences, that a man "is dead in sin" and under the curse of the law, however he may speak about the grace of the gospel: for those who are "alive to God," and "at peace with him," are spiritual in their judgment, affections, and habitual walk, though they grieve that they are not more so. But "the carnal mind is enmity against God," no unregenerate man can delight in his holy law, or be subject to it; and how can it be expected that God should be pleased with the formal services of enemies and rebels? We should, therefore, especially examine ourselves, whether "the Spirit of Christ dwell in us;" for if this be not our case, we do not belong to him, are not in his kingdom, and shall not have our portion with him; but with the wicked, "in the everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels," unless this entire change be wrought in our hearts, and lives, during our continuance in this world.

V. 10—17. If "the Spirit of Christ" have taken possession of our hearts, and renewed his holy image there; the death of our "mortal bodies" will make way for perfecting the life of our immortal souls, in which eternal life now abides; and, through the Redeemer's righteousness, our bodies too shall be raised again to share that glorious felicity. What then can a worldly life present to our view, worthy for a moment to be put in competition with this noble "prize of our high calling?" All that we owe to the flesh, is a holy revenge for the injuries already done, and the hinderances continually given us: and instead of rendering our state doubtful, by living after it in any degree; we should, by the Spirit, continually endeavour, more and more entirely, to mortify it, and repress all its actings. (Note, Gal. 5:16—18, 22—26.) Thus, giving up ourselves to be "led by the Spirit," our adoption will be manifest, we shall gradually be

CHAPTER IX.

The apostle deeply laments the unbelief of his countrymen, and declares his willingness to endure any thing for their salvation, 1—3. He shows the privileges of Israel as a nation, 4, 5; and the difference between Israelites according to the flesh, and the true Israel, 6—8. He illustrates his subject, by the examples of Isaac, of Jacob and Esau, and of Pharaoh; and thus shows the freeness of the mercy of God, and his holy but absolute sovereignty in all his dispensations, 9—18. He answers objections to his doctrine, 19—23; proves it from the prophets, 24—29; and reasons, that the Jews come short of the blessing, (which the Gentiles obtained by faith,) because "they sought it by the works of the law," and rejected Christ, 30—33.

I [a]SAY the truth in Christ, I lie not, [b]my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost, a Is. 45:23. Jer. 4:2. 12:16. 23:5,6. Zech. 14:9. John 13:19. 14:6. Rom. 10:6. Phil. 2:10,11. b 2 Cor. 1:12. 4:2. 5:11. 1 Tim. 1:5. 3:9. 2 Tim. 1:3.

emancipated from servile motives and fears, and shall trust and obey God, and walk with him as our reconciled Father; the Holy Spirit will witness with our consciences, that we have the temper of loving, obedient children towards him; and thus support us in all trials and circumstances with the joyful prospect and most blessed anticipations of our incorruptible inheritance.

V. 18—27. It is the will of our heavenly Father, that "in the world we should have tribulations," and have fellowship with Christ in his sufferings, before we "be glorified together" with him. But on the most rational principles, and most exact computation, we shall find, "that the sufferings of this present time, are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us:" even if, instead of our light trials, we were called to bear as heavy and durable a cross as that of the apostle.—Indeed, sin has filled the world with suffering, yea, with unspeakable disorder and misery: all creatures seem to proclaim man's fatal apostacy, and to recommend the inestimably precious salvation of Christ.—Men every where are most evidently at war with their Maker and with each other: so that the earth is become a great slaughterhouse and burying-ground, to its inhabitants; and the animals are forced into the service of men's lusts, by a most abominable perversion: and the creatures of God are made his rivals, in that men generally, every where and through every age, "have worshipped the creature more than the Creator, who is blessed for evermore." Thus the "creation groans under bondage" to human depravity; every part of it seems to abet man's rebellion, or to be an instrument of his crimes; and the more reflecting even of the heathen could see the strange state of the world, though they saw neither the cause nor the cure of it. But the gospel opens a brighter prospect; a glorious crisis approaches, of which all things seem in anxious expectation. When "the children of God shall be manifested," and separated from his implacable foes, a complete deliverance from this bondage will be given to all, except Satan and his obstinate adherents; and sin, deformity, vanity, and misery, shall be seen no where, but in the bottomless pit. May we then give diligence to insure our interest in this redemption, and to possess "the first fruits of the Spirit, the earnest and pledge" of our inheritance. Then our groans under our share of this universal ruin, while we wait for our final adoption, will be "in hope:" we shall learn to disregard the perishing things which are seen, and patiently to expect and wait for the good things which are unseen and eternal. The Spirit of God will help us under our infirmities to support our trials: and, notwithstanding our own insufficiency, we shall, by his effectual teaching and aid, pray to our heavenly Father, with such large and spiritual desires, and such unutterable pantings after his salvation, as shall ensure a gracious answer, and abundant supplies of every needful blessing.

V. 28—39. If assured, that we really "love God," and that we habitually endeavour to keep his commandments; we may rest satisfied, that all things shall finally terminate to our greatest advantage. For the love of God, ruling in the hearts of those who were once enmity to him, proves that they have been "called according to his purpose," in order to be "conformed to the image of his Son," and made meet as his brethren to be "joint heirs with him." But none can have any ground to think themselves predestinated, called, or justified, or to expect to be glorified; except they love God, bear the image of Christ, walk in his steps, and aim to obey and honour him: and, whatever men may object against these things, they who are thus chosen, called, and justified, shall without doubt be eternally glorified; nor will a single exception be found to this rule, though many will at length appear to have deceived themselves and others. If God has determined to save us, who can destroy us? If "he spared not his own Son, but delivered him" to death for us; how should he refuse any thing to us? If this was not too large a gift for his enemies, what can he withhold from his friends and children? If he justifies us, who can condemn us? If our crucified and risen Jesus pleads and fights for us, who can plead or fight against us, with any possibility of prevailing? If the Judge himself is our Friend, who can pronounce a sentence against us? Or "what can separate us from the love of him" who bled on the cross for us, when we were so guilty and depraved, that hell was our desert, and the doom for which we were meet? While therefore we rejoice in these privileges and this security, and cheerfully expect to be "more than conquerors" in every conflict, and immense gainers by every loss and tribulation, till "death be swallowed up in victory;" let us show the holiness of the doctrine by sparing none of our lusts, shrinking from no hardship or expense, in the cause of Christ, willingly enduring our cross, obeying his commandments, and being "steadfast, unmoveable, and always abounding in his work, as knowing that our labour is not in vain in the Lord." (Note, 1 Cor. 15:55—58.)

NOTES.—CHAP. IX. V. 1—3. From the apostle's arguing so strenuously for "salvation by grace," "through faith" alone, without any respect to the Mosaic law, or the peculiar privileges of the Jews; it might perhaps be inferred, that he had no great attachment to his countrymen; nay that the persecutions, which he had endured from them, had alienated him from them. Being, therefore, about still more fully to discuss the subject of the rejection of the Jews and the calling of the Gentiles, and to resolve the whole into the sovereign electing love of God; he introduced these topics, by expressing, in the most energetic language, his cordial affection for his people. He spoke the truth, as in the presence of Christ his Judge, and with a solemn appeal to him, that he did in no degree deviate from it: his conscience also, being enlightened and directed by "the Holy Spirit, bare witness" to his sincerity, in what he was about to say. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) The appeal is evidently equivalent to a solemn oath. Now, an oath being an act of religious worship; the apostle by thus solemnly appealing to Jesus Christ, and to the Holy Spirit, fully shows, that he considered them as entitled to religious worship, as one with the Father. (Note, Matt. 28:19, 20.) Having made this solemn protestation, he declared that the unbelief and rejection of the Jews excited exceedingly great disquietude, and depression, and constant grief, in his heart, (Note, 8:14—17.) Insomuch, that he would even willingly submit to be treated as an Anathema, or "accursed," after the manner of Christ; to be excommunicated from his visible church, loaded with infamy, crucified, or in any way put to the utmost pain and disgrace; or even for a time to be excluded from all the comfort of communion with Christ, and shut up under the deepest horror and distress of mind which could be endured without sin; if, by any personal sufferings of his own, that could consist with his final salvation, he might rescue his beloved brethren and kinsmen, from that national and personal destruction, which he saw was about to come upon them for their obstinate unbelief. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. c—f. Note, Ex. 32:30—33.)—This seems to be the utmost that the apostle could mean: as it would be utterly unlawful, on any consideration whatever, to wish to be eternally miserable, and an implacable enemy of God, as all who perish will be. (Note, 1 John 3:16, 17.)—"I could even wish," ('if it were proper to make such a wish, if it would avail to make so great a multitude happy,) "I could even wish" so great a blessing to my brethren, though with the loss of my own happiness.' Whithy.

This particle av, which often gives the indicative a subjunctive meaning, is not here inserted; and it may be rendered, "I have wished, &c." On some occasion, perhaps the apostle had passionately wished, or prayed, to this effect. This appears to me the most literal and natural construction of the clause; but, as I can bring no support to the interpretation, from more competent critics, I propose it with great hesitation.—Ευχομαι is not used in any other sense in the New Testament; though it is in the Greek writers.—Accursed.] Αναθεμα. (Note, 2 Tim. 1:3—5.)

V. 4, 5. The apostle was peculiarly grieved, by reflecting, that all the distinguished favours shown to his people, should terminate in the rejection of them for opposing Christ. They were the descendants of Israel, "who wrestled with God and prevailed:" they had long been the professed worshippers of JEHOVAH, to whom the typical adoption pertained. The covenants made with Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Aaron, and David; the law given at mount Sinai; and the national covenant grounded on it, belonged to them, and were so many peculiar honours and advantages, towards their becoming the spiritual people of God. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Note, 3:1, 2.) The worship at the temple, which was both typical of salvation by the Messiah, and the means of grace and communion with God; and the ark of the covenant, the symbol and pledge of the Lord's gracious presence with them, had for ages been their glory. All the promises, concerning Christ and his salvation, were immediately given and preserved to them: they were honourable, by their descent from the ancient patriarchs, who walked with God and were accepted by him; and finally, the Messiah had in the time predicted been born among them, one of their nation "as concerning the flesh;" even He, who is also "God over all" creatures, blessed and praised throughout all worlds, and to all eternity: to this the apostle fixed his cordial Amen. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. i—s.)—The expression "concerning the flesh," implies that Christ had a far higher and nobler nature: even as when Paul used it concerning the Jews his brethren, he intimated his sorrow that they were not his brethren, as the children of God, born of the Spirit, and believers in Christ. This, with various other considerations, undeniably proves, that the apostle here meant, in the most decided manner, to attest the Deity of Christ, as one with the Father, and equally the Object of universal and everlasting adoration. (Note, 1 John 4:1—3.)—There is no example, either in the New Testament or in the Greek translation of the Old Testament, in which the doxology, "Blessed be God," is expressed in the same words, and arranged in the same manner, as in this place. So that the only way, in which the Socinians and Arians have attempted to evade the conclusion, unavoidably deducible from this text, namely, by rendering the clause, "Who is over all; God be blessed for evermore;" rests on a most harsh, unnatural, and unclassical construction, of which no example can be adduced: at the same time that it destroys the antithesis, without which the verse would be wholly destitute of propriety and animation.

V. 6—9. Though the Jews had generally rejected the gospel, and were as a nation excluded from the kingdom of the Messiah; it must not be supposed that his word had failed of accomplishment. (Marg. Ref. t. Notes, 3:3, 4. 11:1—6.) Their national covenant had been fulfilled to them, till it was finally forfeited; the promises respecting the Messiah had been performed; and the spiritual covenant and promises did not belong to them, as a nation, but only to such of them as believed, in common with other believers: (Notes, 15:8—13.) for all were not the true Israel of God, who were naturally descended from Jacob. (Marg. Ref. u. Notes, 2:27—29. 4:9—12. Ps. 73:1. John 1:47—51.) Indeed this had been intimated in the case of Abraham and his seed; for the covenant made with him, in favour of his children, did not include all his posterity; but it was limited to the line of Isaac, when the Lord said to him, "In Isaac shall thy seed be called." (Marg. Ref. x, y. Notes, Gen. 17:17—21. 21:8—12.) So that all his children, in the ordinary course of things, were not adopted, as the children of God, even in a typical sense: but those only, who sprang from him according to the promise, and by the extraordinary power of God performing it, when Sarah was naturally past child-bearing. (Marg. Ref. z—b. Notes, Gen. 17:5, 6, 19—21. 18:9—15. 21:1—7.)—The apostle evidently speaks of a true Israel, among the descendants of Israel; a remnant, as distinguished from the nation at large: and he introduces the case of Abraham and his two sons, and afterwards that of Esau and Jacob, not as examples, but as illustrations, of his main subject. (Notes, Gal. 4:21—31. 6:15,16.) If this were carefully noted, the perplexity which involves the reasonings of many learned men on this passage, would in a great measure vanish. "The children of the promise," are those 'whom God gives to Abraham, by a spiritual generation, whether alone, as in the case of us Gentiles; or added to the carnal generation, as in the case of Isaac, and of all believing Jews. ... They who interpret "the children of promise," to mean those who by faith embrace the promise; say indeed what is fact, but do not speak with suitable precision: for the apostle does not in this place distinguish the children of Abraham from others, by their faith as known; but he discourses concerning the primary cause, that is, the fountain of their faith itself, namely the eternal purpose of gratuitous election.' Beza.—Isaac was promised some time before his birth: and the faithfulness and power of God having fulfilled that promise, he was "the child of promise," in whom Abraham's "seed should be called," and in whose "Seed the nation should be blessed:" but Ishmael was not thus previously promised; and it was foretold that the chosen nation, which was to inherit Canaan, and from whom the Messiah was appointed to spring, would not descend from him, but from Isaac. In like manner, all the descendants of Israel were not entitled to the spiritual blessings of the covenant; but only "the remnant according to the election of grace," which was found among them: and these, being regenerated and having believed in Christ, were brought into the family of believing Abraham, as the children of promise, in whom the promises to him, concerning his numerous posterity and their extraordinary privileges, should be especially fulfilled. (Notes, 4:9—17. 11:1—6. Matt. 3:7—10. Gal. 3:26—29. Heb. 6:13—15.)—In thus adducing the case of Isaac and Ishmael, the apostle certainly did not decide on the eternal state of either of these individuals: yet the subject which he thus illustrated, namely, a remnant of believers among an unbelieving nation, must refer, not to outward advantages and disadvantages, but to eternal salvation or damnation: for "he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned." And this is equally clear, whether it be held, that this remnant believed, in consequence of their being elected; or that they were chosen, in consequence of their faith, either as foreseen, or as actually exercised.—In Isaac, &c. V. 10—14. As Isaac was Abraham's only son, by Sarah his wife; it might have been supposed, that the covenanted blessings were limited to him on that account. Yet not only Ishmael, Abraham's son by Hagar, the bondwoman, and his children by Keturah, were excluded; but even Esau and his posterity, though the elder son of Isaac and Rebekah and twin-brother to Jacob, was set aside; and this not subsequent to any crime by which he forfeited the birthright, but previously. For even before the children were born, and consequently "before they had done any good or evil," it was said to Rebekah that "the elder should serve the younger;" (Note, Gen. 25:22,23.) which certainly implied the special favour of God to Jacob above Esau, and that the covenanted blessings respecting Canaan, the oracles and ordinances of God, and the promised Messiah, would be restricted to him and his descendants. This clearly indicated, that "the purpose of God," in respect of "the heirs of promise," would be established according to his sovereign election, who calls men to partake of the blessing as he pleases; and not in the foresight of any works which they would perform. Doubtless, God foresaw that Esau's works would be profane and evil; (Notes, Gen. 25:31—34. 27:41,42. Heb. 12:15—17.) and Jacob's in a measure pious and holy: but the good works of Jacob could only be foreseen, as the effect of his election and consequent regeneration: and thus foreseen as the effect, they could not be the cause of these blessings. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. c—k. Note, Eph. 1:3—8.) God foresaw both Esau and Jacob as "born in sin, and by nature the children of wrath, even as others;" (Note, Eph. 2:3.) and he knew that, if left to themselves, they would continue in sin through life: but (for wise and holy reasons known to himself but not revealed to us) he purposed to change Jacob's heart, and to leave Esau to his native perverseness: because he freely loved Jacob, but did not in the same manner love Esau. Wickedness foreseen is doubtless the cause of the Lord's purpose to condemn; because it is of a man's self by nature, and God condemns none, who do not justly deserve it: but holiness foreseen in a fallen creature, cannot be the cause of his election; because it is the effect of new creating grace, and never comes from any other source. Thus preterition, or non-election, of a fallen creature, is not gratuitous, but merited: election, shown in regeneration, is gratuitous. This instance of Esau and Jacob was intended as an illustration of the divine conduct towards the fallen race of man.—It has often been urged, that Jacob and Esau were not so much personally intended, as their posterity; and that temporal, and not eternal, things are spoken of: and this is certainly true. Jacob never had dominion over Esau personally, but his posterity ruled over Esau's. (Notes, Gen. 25:22,23. 27:27—29,39,40. Mal. 1:2—5.)—The election, the prediction, the birthright, and the blessing, secured to Jacob and his seed the same religious advantages, which the promise of God secured to Isaac and his seed: and excluded Esau, as well as Ishmael, from them: and this, without determining any thing of Esau's eternal state; though his character, and the epithet profane annexed to his name by the apostle, seem to indicate, that he was not a believer. It is however evident, that the subject illustrated related to individuals and to their eternal state, whether as believers or unbelievers. As Esau, that "the purpose of God according to election might stand," had no inheritance in Canaan, and was not the progenitor of Christ; so those Israelites, who did not belong to "the election of grace," were excluded from the true church, had no part in Christ, and no inheritance in heaven. But the reverse was true of "the election of grace:" those who belonged to this election were "called," and in consequence believed; they were "justified" in Christ and "glorified:" (Note, 8:28—31.) and the same is the case in respect of men, in all other ages and nations. If indeed, there were any of our race, not fallen like other men, or not "by nature dead in sin, and children of wrath, even as others;" if there were any inclined, without preventing grace, to repent, and to believe the humbling, holy gospel of Christ, to love God and obey his will; then indeed the election might be made, with respect to their foreseen faith and obedience. But on this supposition, what ground would there be for the objections, which the apostle evidently supposes would be made to his doctrine? or what reason to silence them, in the manner he afterwards does; when he might easily, and consistently with truth, have given an answer far more satisfactory to the objectors by clearly explaining his meaning? It is then inquired, First, Are all men, as born of Adam, equally depraved? and secondly, Is man willing of himself to do what is spiritually good; or does the grace of God make him willing? When these questions are answered, according to the Scriptures, and the articles and liturgy of our church, it will readily be perceived, that no good, foreseen, either in the hearts or lives of sinners, could be the cause of their election to eternal life.—If then God loved Jacob, and hated Esau, (or showed him less favour than Jacob,) without any reference to their works, as comparatively good or bad, then the grand principle is established, that God does show more favour to one man than to another, independently of their righteousness or unrighteousness. And, "is there unrighteousness with God?" could any injustice be objected to him? By no means: he did Esau no wrong in leaving him to his own choice; and he, and his posterity, received more favours than they deserved: nor did the unmerited love of God, to Jacob and his posterity, in any measure injure Esau.—Even in respect of holy creatures, we must either allow, that God may justly permit them to sin, and punish them for it, and so at least foreknow, both the permission and the punishment; or else we must deny that he can act as a moral Governor of the universe. For, if this were not just, God would be bound to prevent all his creatures from sinning: and if any were left to sin, He only would be the cause of it. Indeed, men are not aware what blasphemy is involved, in their bold objections on this subject.—Much more then may God righteously leave fallen creatures to themselves, to proceed in rebellion, and sink into destruction. He might justly have thus left all: it is of infinite mercy that any are saved; their salvation can be no injury to those, who are punished only according to the desert of their own sins: and it is evident, that most of the objections, brought against these doctrines, originate from the want of a deep conviction, that God would have been just, had he left our whole fallen race under final condemnation; as the supposition that he leaves a large proportion of them thus to perish, excites in numbers the same opposition, and leads them to the same exclamations and objections, as the doctrine of personal election. Indeed, the sentence to be denounced at the last day, on the unnumbered millions of the wicked, is as dreadful, as any thing in this doctrine can be. (Notes, 3:5—8. Matt. 25:41—46.)—The election of nations, to special privileges and religious advantages, not vouchsafed to other nations, which some expositors suppose to be here meant, (contrary to the whole tenor of the context,) is liable to all the same objections, as personal election; and can only be vindicated in the same way. All nations might justly be left without them: and when some are mercifully favoured with them, "that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works but of him that calleth;" no wrong is done to the others. The elder, &c. V. 15—18. 'Mercy presupposes misery and sin, or the voluntary corruption of the human race: and this corruption presupposes a creation in purity and uprightness.' Beza.—Moses himself had written as strong language concerning the sovereignty of God in showing mercy, as the apostle used, when JEHOVAH declared, "I will have mercy on whom I have mercy; and I will have compassion on whom I have compassion;" for the latter clause is in the present tense; which implies, that he would by no influence be induced to alter his fixed purpose of showing mercy, or executing vengeance. (Marg. Ref. p. Note, Ex. 33:18,19.) In the case of Jacob, it indeed appeared, that he was willing to obtain the blessing, and he ran at his mother's word: thus he prevented Esau; and Isaac, contrary to his purpose, blessed him: but the whole transaction was disgraceful, and merited the indignation rather than the favour of God. (Marg. Ref. q. Notes, Gen. 27:1—29.) The establishment, however, of the covenant with Jacob, and his posterity, did not originate from this "willing or running," but from the electing love of God; whose purpose respecting him had been made known many years before.—Thus believers greatly desire the salvation of Christ, and labour to secure it: yet these desires are streams from the fountain of electing love. They "were by nature children of wrath, even as others: but God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved them, even when they were dead in sins, hath quickened them together with Christ." (Notes, John 15:12—16. Eph. 2:3—10. Tit. 3:4—7.) Thus he makes them willing by regeneration; and they are inclined and excited to the diligent use of means, and through these they are made partakers of salvation; the sinfulness attending their very diligence, being graciously forgiven. (Note, Phil. 2:12,13.) Whereas they, who are not thus willing and diligent, are not made unwilling by any positive act of God; but their unwillingness is the consequence of their own pride, self-will, love of sin, and aversion to God and holiness. It springs from innate depravity, and is increased and strengthened by habits of disobedience; and can never be removed, except by an act of almighty power, which God cannot be bound in justice to perform for any of his rebellious creatures. Men are 'indeed naturally willing to be saved from misery, and made happy; and are often very diligent in proud and unbelieving endeavours to obtain their object: (Note, 10:1—4.) but this is widely different from a cordial willingness, to be saved from sin as well as misery, and made holy and happy, in the humbling method of the gospel: diligently to use all the means, freely to submit to all the privations, and patiently to endure all the self-denial, requisite in order to obtain it.—This subject might be further illustrated by the case of Pharaoh. God, the Creator, advanced him in his providence to great authority and prosperity, and spared his life through the several plagues of Egypt: but, at the same time, he left him to harden his self in enmity and rebellion. Now God had declared, that he intended this on purpose that in his destruction he might make known his own power and glory throughout the earth. (Marg. Ref. s—x. Notes, Ex. 4:21. 7:13. 8:15. 9:13—16.) So that it must be allowed, that God has mercy on such of our apostate race, as he sees good; and that "he hardeneth whom he will," by leaving them to themselves, and under the power of Satan; by ordering his dispensations respecting them in such a manner, as he knows will exasperate their enmity and embolden their presumption and by judicially sentencing them to final obduracy, that his justice in their punishment may become the more conspicuous. (Note, 2 Thes. 2:8—12.)—As Pharaoh perished in desperate rebellion against God, who can deny, that his ruin was eternal, as well as temporal; personal, not national?—'This hardening also is voluntary, because the Lord, offended by their depravity, makes use of their own will, in executing this judgment on those whom he hardens. Then follow the fruits of this hardening, namely unbelief and sins, which are the real causes of the condemnation of the reprobate.'—Beza. I will have mercy, &c. (15) From the Sept. (Ex. 33:19.) —Even for this same, &c. (17) This varies considerably from the Sept. and gives a far more energetic translation of the Hebrew. (Ex. 9:16.)

V. 19—21. The unhumbled opposer would be sure here to object and cavil, and to inquire 'why the Lord blamed or punished Pharaoh, or indeed any man, for his sins. Who had resisted his sovereign will and appointment? Even they, who most rebel against his precepts, fulfil his decrees: his will is therefore universally done, and no creature makes any opposition to it!'—As if the secret purpose of God were or possibly could be, a rule of duty to his creatures! Or as if a man could intend to do the will of God, by breaking his express commandments, out of enmity to him, and to gratify his own lusts! (Marg. Ref. a, b.) To this presumptuous objector (and such objectors are very numerous, when both the avowed enemies, and the false friends, of these doctrines are included,) the apostle answered, by demanding of him, (a man, a sinner,) "who he was," that he should count himself authorized to "reply against God," and to charge him with injustice, or want of wisdom, for those things which he had expressly spoken and done. (Notes, Job 33:12,13. 34:10 —30. 42:1—6.) Was it proper for the creature to call his Creator to an account, for having formed him as he saw good? Would not men allow the infinite God the same sovereign right to manage the affairs of the creation, as the potter exercises in disposing of his clay, when of the same lump he makes one vessel to a more honourable, and another to a meaner use? (Marg. and Marg. Ref. d—g. Notes, 22,23. Is. 45:9,10. 64:6—8. Jer. 18:1—10. 2 Tim. 2:20—22.) Would they give the "only wise God" no credit for his justice, wisdom, truth, and goodness, when they could not fully comprehend them? Would they not infer, from his infinite perfection, that he could not do wrong, however, it might appear to them? And could there be any danger from the exercise of absolute sovereignty by infinite wisdom and excellency? would they dare to dictate to the Lord, to determine what he ought to do, or to call him to an account for what he had done? (Note, 11:33—36.)—The apostle could not mean, as it is plain from the whole context, that God might justly make innocent creatures miserable by prerogative, which some seem at least to suppose; for he goes upon the supposition, that the sovereignty of God is that of infinite wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness: and that he always decrees to do, what is the most proper to be done. The words, "I will have mercy, on whom I will have mercy," imply that all deserved wrath; so that "the lump of clay, in the hands of the potter," must refer to men already existing in God's foreknowledge as fallen creatures. But the apostle intended to repress the arrogance of ignorant presumptuous worms, who venture to speak about iniquitous cruelty and tyranny, in discoursing of their offended Creator and Judge; who decide, by vain reasoning in their own minds, how the infinite God ought to act; and then forgetting who He is, and who they are, charge him foolishly, and say, that if such and such doctrines be indeed true, then God is—But their words ought not to be repeated. This very common practice is such a compound of arrogance, irreverence, and folly, that it seems the most glaring proof of human depravity, which even this wicked world exhibits; especially when it is added, that pious men sometimes appear, in the violence of controversy, to be betrayed into it.—It is wonderful that the great Mr. Locke should confidently assert, that the apostle here speaks of men nationally, and not personally, in reference to their eternal state; when the rejection of the Jewish nation, with the reservation only of "a remnant according to the election of grace," was the apostle's main subject, to illustrate which all the other examples are introduced. This remnant consisted of a small number of individuals, not of a nation; and the Gentile converts were individuals out of their several nations, forming, with the Jewish converts, the Christian church; and not whole nations, or one whole nation, chosen as a collective body, to succeed to the external advantages, which the nation of Israel had forfeited; and surely "the vessels of mercy prepared unto glory," which the apostle next mentions, must have been chosen, not to external advantages, but to eternal life! (Notes, 8:28—31. 2 Thes. 2:13,14. 1 Pet. 1:1—5.)

V. 22, 23. Suppose that God was pleased, (as in the instance of Pharaoh,) in order more conspicuously to display his powerful wrath against his enemies, to endure their provocations with patience and forbearance for a long time, till they had acted out the desperate wickedness of their hearts, and filled up the measure of their sins, and so become ripe for signal vengeance; what injustice could there be in this? In allusion to the potter's vessels, they were in themselves "vessels of wrath;" and their wicked dispositions and actions, rendered them "fitted for destruction." Nor could they have been preserved from destruction, but by an act of omnipotent power; as well as by the exercise of unmerited mercy: this, God was not bound, and did not see good to bestow; and indeed they were too proud and wicked to ask or desire it, or even to accept it, or own their need of it. They "despised the riches of that long-suffering" which spared them: they "treasured up wrath" in the impenitence of their hearts; and at length they received their due recompense. (Marg. Ref. h, i. Note, 2:4—6.) On the other hand, should the Lord choose to display the abundance of his glorious power, truth, and love, in his dealings with some of the same lump, whom he had selected to be "vessels of mercy;" what was this to others? These were not in themselves more meet for holy felicity than the former; but he was pleased to prepare them before for it, by his regenerating and sanctifying grace; as well as to make them capable of actively glorifying him here on earth. But did his free love to them imply injustice to others? Their cause for gratitude was immense: but had those, who suffer no more than they deserve, any ground for complaint? while he withholds from none their due, he has surely a right "to do what he will with his own." (Marg. Ref. l, m. Note and P. O. Matt. 20:1—16, vv. 10—16.)—The different language used concerning "the vessels of wrath," and "the vessels of mercy," is of the greatest importance in stating this doctrine solidly and scripturally: the former are "fitted for destruction:" it is not said, that God had fitted them. For he saw them, in themselves, both deserving wrath and fit for the place of torment, and the society of fallen angels: but God himself "had afore prepared the vessels of mercy," for that glory to which he intended to advance them. The term "vessels of mercy," implies, that they too had deserved wrath; and the "preparation for glory," shows that in themselves they had been unprepared. (Notes, Eph. 2:1—10. Tit. 3:3—7.

V. 24—29. (Note, 22,23.) "The vessels of mercy," or converts to Christianity, had been called from among the Gentiles as well as the Jews. (Marg. Ref. n, o. Note, 8: 28—31.) This gave great offence to the unbelieving Jews; yet their own prophets had expressly foretold it. Hosea had predicted, that they would "be beloved" of God as his people, who "had not been beloved;" (Notes, Hos. 1:8—10. 2:21—23.) and Isaiah had shown, that only a remnant would be saved from the innumerable multitudes of Israel; and that God would finish his work with that nation, in a righteous, but compendious manner; or by taking a short account of the chosen people among them, and consigning the rest to just destruction throughout the whole land: (Notes, Is. 10:21—23.) and that except a seed, or "a very small remnant," had been left, the nation would have been destroyed like Sodom and Gomorrah. (Marg. Ref. p—d. Note, Is. 1:7—9.)—A remnant of Israel, reserved by God for himself, while the rest were given up to just punishment, demonstrates, that the election, however understood, was personal, not national.—I will call, &c. (27—29) The case is the same in these quotations. (Is. 1:9. 10:21—23.) Nothing can be more clear, than that the inspired writer intended to give the general sense of the Scriptures, in such a translation into the Greek, as was proper: yet, as the Romans were chiefly conversant in the Septuagint, he used the words of that version, except when there was a good reason for varying from them.—'From comparing the original with the Septuagint, no one can deny, that the Greek interpreters have in fact rendered the passage very negligently, as far as words are concerned. Should any one ask why the apostle nevertheless used that translation; I answer, that he did this very properly, because those to whom he wrote had been used to that translation: and that, as far as the sentiment is concerned, in support of which Paul adduced this testimony, the Greek interpreters had preserved it sufficiently faithful. Nor does it signify any other, either in the Hebrew or the Greek, than that God had determined to render the number of an ungrateful people extremely small.' Beza.

V. 30—33. The apostle having shown, that both the purposes and predictions of God were fulfilled, in the rejection of the unbelieving Jews, and the calling of the Gentiles, here proceeds to show by what means the things had been effected; for this also illustrated the argument, that the Lord had acted righteously, and the Jews wickedly, in the whole concern. The Gentiles, who before lived in the grossest religious ignorance, idolatry, and vice, without at all "following after righteousness," had suddenly, through the surprising grace of God, been brought into a state of acceptance with Him, being called to partake of "the righteousness of God by faith." (Marg. Ref. e—h. Notes, 1:17. 3:21—26. 4:9—12. Gal. 3:26—29. Phil. 3:8—11. Heb. 11:7. 2 Pet. 1:1,2.)—But Israel who had the law, both that which contained the rule of righteousness, and that which shadowed forth the way of justification: and who had sedulously paid regard to it as "the law of righteousness," "had not attained to the law of righteousness." Not living up to their law, they were not justified, but condemned by it; yet, cleaving to it, they rejected Christ and his salvation. (Marg. Ref. i—l. Note, 10:1—4.) Wherefore then had they failed of acceptance? Was it merely through God's decree? Or did he refuse to receive them, in the same way as the Gentiles were justified? That was by no means the case: but they refused to seek the blessing "by faith," as an unmerited favour; and presisted in claiming it "by the law," as a matter of right. This they did, "as it were, by the works of the law:" they did not think that they perfectly kept the law, but they expected to make up their deficiencies in one respect, by abounding in others; or by repentance, and amendment, and the legal sacrifices; or by superstitious additions, and observing the traditions of men. Thus they sought the blessing from that law, which denounced a curse upon them; and refused to trust in him who was raised up to bless them. At this stumblingstone they fell, as it had been predicted that they would. Their obstinate pride and unbelief were the immediate cause of their ruin; and God had decreed, in righteousness, nothing more than to give them up to the lusts of their own hearts. (Marg. Ref. m—o. Notes, Is. 8:11—15. 28:16. 1 Pet. 2:7, 8.)—Some expositors think, that the apostle had reference to a race, in which the Jews, with all their advantages, were so far from coming in before the Gentiles, that they were left at a great distance behind: "for the last shall be first, and the first last." (Note, Matt. 19:29,30.)—Mr. Locke and many others argue, that the apostle only meant, that the Gentiles here spoken of, as those whom God had called, (24) had embraced the true religion; not that they were actually and individually brought into a state of salvation: but surely, if they "attained to righteousness, even the righteousness which is of faith," they were justified persons, "children of Abraham," children of God, and heirs of heaven; and they had before been spoken of "as vessels of mercy, prepared before unto glory." Though all who professed the gospel were not of this character, yet none else were partakers of "the righteousness which is of faith."—It it also granted, as these learned expositors maintain, that the dealings of God with the Jews, and not his general conduct towards mankind at large, as to their eternal concerns, is the primary subject of the chapter: but the dispensations of God with Israel are explained, illustrated, and justified, on such principles, as establish in the clearest manner, the method of his dealings with mankind at large. And if we are not allowed to infer general conclusions, from the commands, testimonies, promises, and dispensations of God to Israel, in respect of individuals; it does not appear, how we can use the Scriptures, or a great proportion of them at least, either for doctrinal or practical purposes; either for encouragement, warning, or "instruction in righteousness."—"Whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning."—"All these things happened unto them for ensamples; and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come. Therefore let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall." (Notes, 15:4—7. 1 Cor. 10:1—12.)—The Jews, as a nation, had outward privileges; and so have Christians, as a collective body. Most of them trusted in these outward privileges, and rejected the salvation of Christ; and so do the bulk of professed Christians. A remnant, however, believed and were saved, while the rest were hardened and rejected: the case is the same with professed Christians. This remnant was "the election of grace;" and so is the remnant of true Christians. (Notes, 24—29. 11:1—6. Matt. 11:25,26. John 5:36—40.)—Behold I lay, &c. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5. The command of "loving our neighbour as ourselves," and the example of Christ, require us to mourn over obstinate transgressors, especially when near to us "according to the flesh;" at the same time, that we vindicate the justice of God in his dealings with them. (Note, Luke 19:41—44. P. O. 28—48.) This sorrow and anguish of heart, springing from natural affection, will indeed alloy our present consolations: but they are active principles, exciting us to use proper means for the conversion of those around us, and to submit to hardship, reproach, loss, or suffering, in our compassionate endeavours for their good: and the more they rule in our hearts, and influence our conduct, the more we resemble him, who "was made a curse for us, to redeem us from the curse of the law."—We cannot at present know the purposes of God respecting others: it will be soon enough for us to be "without natural affection," when perfected in holiness; and to rejoice in the destruction of the enemies of God individually, when the event makes them known to us. In the mean time, insensibility to the eternal condition of our fellow-creatures is contrary both to the love required by the law, and the mercy of the gospel: and the more we can appeal to our heart-searching Judge, through the testimony of his Spirit in our consciences, that we sincerely pity, pray for, and would suffer any thing to save, our most virulent despisers and persecutors: the greater confidence we may use, in affectionately warning them of their danger, and of the delusions into which they are fallen. For no external forms, notions, means, promises, or intercourse with eminent saints, can profit such as have not themselves "the power of godliness." Nay, if we stood related to Christ himself, "according to the flesh," we should be in no degree profited by it; unless we submitted to him, and trusted, worshipped, and obeyed him, as "God over all, blessed for ever." (Notes, Matt. 12:46—50. Luke 11:27,28. 2 Cor. 5:16.)

V. 6—21. The whole Scripture shows the difference between the professed Christian, and the real believer. Outward privileges are bestowed on many, who are not "the children of God." These are "born of the Spirit," according to the promise and "purpose of him," who "worketh all things after the counsel of his own will," and not because they were better, by nature, or of themselves, than others. For "the Lord hath mercy on whom he will have mercy," and "it is not of him that willeth, or of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy." (Notes, John 1:10—13. 3:7,8.) There is, however, abundant encouragement to the diligent use of the means of grace, which God has appointed. The promises, invitations, and exhortations of Scripture, are perfectly consistent with the secret purposes of God. Where there is a willing mind, and humble diligence in seeking him, the blessing will certainly be given: and the happy believer will in due time, ascribe even this willingness to electing love. But if men wilfully harden themselves in disobedience and impenitence; God will show his power and vengeance in their destruction, and cause all their abused prosperity to increase their condemnation, and his own glory in it. Who could have previously thought, that any of our race would have presumed to say, that "there is unrighteousness with God!" to quarre with his judgments, and plead that "none hath resisted his will" or counsel! Shall criminals cite their offended Sovereign to their blasphemous tribunal? If they do, let them see to it, for "evil is before them." "He that sitteth in heaven will deride" their folly, and "vex them in his hot displeasure." He will proceed with his own plan, exercising his holy sovereignty as he sees good; and distinguishing between those who adore, and those who blaspheme, the depths which they cannot fathom: and he will number with the latter, all those who profess to believe the doctrines in question, and then take occasion from them to sin with greater presumption. But surely, all who love and fear God, however such truths may dazzle and dismay them, should reverently keep silence before him. And even if they hear them stated unscripturally or licentiously; they should take care what words they use in disputing against those who pervert the truth; that they may not appear to countenance the impieties of infidels and ungodly men. In short, modesty, caution, humility, and profound awe of the holy Majesty of God, should restrain and guide the tongues and pens of all, who speak or write on these subjects; however satisfied they may be with their own views of them: and every sentence which is written or spoken, in a manner, which on any supposition, imputes injustice to God, is a proof of the pride and irreverence of the writer or speaker.

CHAPTER X.

The apostle again shows his earnest desire of Israel's salvation; testifying that they had zeal, stating wherein it was erroneous, and distinguishing between the righteousness of the law, and that of faith, 1—11. He maintains that Jews and Gentiles are, in this respect, on equal terms, 12, 13; that the gospel must be preached to the Gentiles in order to their believing in Christ, 14—18; and that the prophets had foretold the rejection of the Jews, and the calling of the Gentiles, 19—21.

BRETHREN, [a]my heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved.

2 For [b]I bear them record [c]that they have a zeal of God, [d]but not according to knowledge.

3 For they being ignorant of [e]God's righteousness, and going about [f]to establish their own righteousness, have not [g]submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God.

4 For [h]Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth.

5 For Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law, [i]That the man which doeth those things shall live by them.

6 But [k]the righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise, [l]Say not in thy heart, Who shall ascend into heaven? (that is, [m]to bring Christ down from above;)

7 Or, Who shall descend into the deep? (that is, [n]to bring up Christ again from the dead.)

8 But what saith it? [o]The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth, and in thy heart: that is, [p]the word of faith, which we preach:

9 That [q]if thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, [r]and shalt believe in thy heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved.

10 For [s]with the heart, man believeth [t]unto righteousness; [u]and with the mouth, confession is made unto salvation.

11 For the Scripture saith, [x]Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed.

[Practical Observations.]

V. 22—33. The descendants of fallen Adam are in themselves "vessels of wrath," and God's long-suffering towards them is very wonderful: yet the practice and habits of disobedience renders them still more and more "fitted for destruction." But "the vessels of mercy" were originally of the same lump; and that new creation, by which they are "afore prepared unto glory," is as great a display of the riches of God's grace and mercy, as the inheritance which he freely bestows upon them. If we have experienced something of this change; surely, in our own case, we must allow that the Lord alone has made us to differ: (Notes, 1 Cor. 4:6,7. 15:3—11.) and, instead of disputing against that free electing love, whence all our happiness flows, we should be employed in adoring his pardoning mercy and new creating grace, or in "giving diligence to make our calling and election sure;" while those who know nothing of this change ought to be far otherwise employed, than in disputing either for or against this doctrine. Let them "strive to enter in at the strait gate," before the door be for ever shut; and leave the discussion of these abstruse questions to those, who are walking with God in the way to heaven.—As many of us have now obtained mercy, and are the people and children of the living God, who once were far off from him; so we may pray, and hope, and take encouragement to use diligently all proper means, that this may be the case with others throughout the earth. For alas! even among the vast number of professing Christians, it is to be feared that only "a remnant will be saved;" and the Lord will be righteous in the destruction of an immense majority. Blessed be his name, that he has left us also a seed of true believers, to preserve our land from being as Sodom and Gomorrah; yet this will not prevent very many individuals from perishing with still deeper destruction. While numbers "care for none of these things," and perish through open impiety: and while some are snatched from among them, by an unexpected conversion, and "pass from death to life," through the righteousness of faith and the grace of the gospel; others, who seem intent on "following after the law of righteousness" attain not to it, "because they seek it not by faith, but as it were by the works of the law;" by an indistinct observance of an imaginary rule, and expecting to atone for sin by forms, sacraments, alms, and superstitions, and by some general notion of Christ's making up the rest. On "this stumblingstone" how many fall, and lose the race! Being offended at the humbling, levelling doctrines of free grace, they even make the precious Foundation for our hope, which God himself has laid, and on which "whoever trusts shall never be ashamed," (Note, 1 Cor. 3:10—15.) "a Stone of stumbling, and a Rock of offence;" and so perish with an aggravated destruction.—From such a downfal, good Lord, deliver us! Amen.

NOTES.—CHAP. X. V. 1—4. Aware of the offence which his doctrine would give the Jews, and even many of the Jewish Christians; the apostle repeated his protestation, of his earnest desires, and fervent prayers, for the salvation of his people; notwithstanding their prejudices against him, and the persecutions which he had endured from them. (Note, 9:1—3.)—He was also ready to bear testimony in behalf of the Jews, that they had "a zeal of God;" or a very great zeal, in things relating to God and religion. They were very zealous for the worship of God, according to the law of Moses, as they understood it; but this zeal was misguided and ignorant, founded on a misconstruction of the law itself, and of the national covenant; and so leading them fatally to oppose the kingdom and salvation of the promised Messiah. (Marg. Ref. a—d. Notes, Acts 22:1—5. 26:9—11. Gal. 1:11—14. Phil. 3:1—7.) For they, not knowing the perfect justice of the divine character, law, and government, and the nature of that righteousness, which God had provided for the justification of sinners consistently with his own glory, had sought by various devices to "establish their own righteousness," as the meritorious ground of their justification; in doing which, they had refused to submit to the justice of God in their condemnation, and to seek righteousness as his free gift by faith alone. (Marg. Ref. e—g. Notes, 1:17. 3:21—26. 9:30—33.)—The expression "establish their own righteousness," seems to be taken from a person, who allows that his house is out of repair, and in some danger of falling; but will not be convinced that the foundation is destroyed, and that it must come down, and be entirely rebuilt on a new foundation. He therefore endeavours, by props and buttresses, and various repairs, to make the house stand: but all his expense and labour are thrown away; and, if he persist in his vain endeavour, it will be likely to fall down, and bury him in its ruins. (Note, Matt. 7:24—27.) Thus the Jews, (and immense numbers in every age do the same for substance though in varied forms,) when convinced of defects in their moral righteousness, endeavoured to repair them, by ceremonial or superstitious observances: nor would they be convinced, that they were building on a false foundation; that they must totally give over these vain and perilous endeavours; and come for a gratuitous salvation to Christ by faith, even as the poor Gentiles did. To this they would not submit; because they did not know, that Christ was "the end" and scope of the law, for the justification of all believers. The strictness and sanction of the moral law showed men their need of salvation by grace, through faith; and the ceremonies shadowed forth Christ and his work, as fulfilling the righteousness, and bearing the curse of the law: so that, even under the law, all who were justified before God obtained that blessing by faith, which interested them in the perfect righteousness of the promised and divine Redeemer. (Marg. Ref. h. Notes, Is. 45:20—25. 51:4—6. 54:15—17. Jer. 23:5,6.)—Some argue, that if the apostle had in the preceding chapter meant, that the rejection of the Jewish nation was absolutely decreed, he would not have prayed for them; but it may be answered, that he knew a remnant was excepted: he did not know to what number this remnant might extend, and his "good-will," or benevolence, towards them was so strong, that he prayed for the conversion of Israelites, in a way which implied a longing desire that they all might be saved. Had it depended on him, this would have been the case: he prayed according to the knowledge which he had, and left secret things to God; adoring his wisdom and justice, even in those events which were contrary to the feelings and desires of his heart.—The author of these notes can answer for one, that his firm belief of personal election and the divine decrees, does not in the least interfere with his joining heartily in that prayer of our excellent liturgy, 'That it may please God to have mercy upon all men.' (Notes, Jer. 14: 0—12. 15:1.)

ing to the law; and thus it effectually cut off all transgressors from every hope, in this way. (Marg. Ref. i. Notes, Lev. 18:5. Deut. 27:26. Ez. 20:11. Luke 10:25—29. Gal. 3:10—14.) But "the righteousness of faith" might be introduced, as using the words of Moses, on an especial occasion. (Note, Deut. 30:11—14.)—The self-condemned sinner is not called on to perplex himself with inquiries, how this righteousness may be found: or to "say in his heart, Who shall ascend into heaven," to fetch down one who may introduce such a righteousness? For Christ has already come down and finished that work. Nor is he put upon inquiring, Who shall descend into the grave, or the place of departed spirits, to bring back the crucified Saviour from the dead? for that also was already done, and he was exalted at the right hand of the Father, to confer the blessing on all who in true faith applied to him for it. Nor was the information, respecting the means of obtaining it, at a distance, that men should travel into far countries to inquire after it, as philosophers often did, or as the queen of Sheba. (Note, 1 Kings 10:1,2.) On the contrary, it "was nigh to them," in "the word of faith," which the ministers of Christ were sent to preach; it was in the mouth of all who professed the gospel, and in the hearts of all who believed it. (Marg. Ref. k—p.) In short, if a man confessed faith in Jesus, as the Lord and Saviour of lost sinners, and really "believed in his heart, that God had raised him from the dead," in attestation of having accepted his atonement, he should certainly be saved, by the righteousness of Christ imputed to him through faith. (Marg. Ref. q, r. Note, 4:23—25.) That faith, by which a sinner is made "the righteousness of God in Christ," has its seat in "the heart" of a humble penitent, and produces cordial desires after him and love to him: and the bold confession of his name and truth, among enemies, and in the face of danger, evidences a man's faith to be genuine, and gives a sure hope of complete salvation, according to the prophecy before referred to. (Marg. Ref. s—x. Notes, 9:30—33. Is. 28:16.)—The distinction between "confessing with the mouth," and "believing in the heart," shows that the apostle was discoursing, not of a mere profession of Christianity, but of the genuine sincerity of him who made that profession. (Notes, Mark 16:14—16. 1 Pet. 3:21,22.) On the other hand, those who refused to make this open profession, in times of persecution, had no reason to conclude, that in their hearts they truly believed in Christ, for righteousness and salvation. 'Justification is here expressly ascribed to faith, not as including works, but only as being that principle, which, when it is cordial and sincere, will certainly produce them.' Whithy. (Note, Matt. 10:32,33.)—The man which doeth, &c. (5) Nearly from the LXX, which accord to the Hebrew. (Lev. 18:5.)—Say not, &c. (6—8.) The apostle here takes the general sentiment, and expresses it in his own language; which is not exactly according either to the LXX or the Hebrew. (Deut. 30:12—14.)

V. 12—17. In respect of the subject of which the apostle was discoursing, there was "no difference" between Jews and Gentiles: for as none of them could be justified by their works, or saved in unbelief; so the infinite Creator and Governor of the world, being rich and plenteous in mercy towards all who humbly call on him for salvation, would never exclude from justification any who believed in his Son. (Marg. Ref. y—a. Notes, 3:27—31.) Thus the prophet had foretold, concerning the times of the Messiah, that "whosoever should call on the name of the LORD would be saved." (Notes, Joel 2:28—32. Acts 2:14—21. 9:10—14.17—22.) The Jews in general called upon JEHOVAH for temporal deliverance and eternal salvation, even while they rejected Christ; but they called in vain: this therefore could not be the intent of the prophecy. By "calling on the name of the Lord," we must understand, either invoking the Lord Jesus personally, as the incarnate Word, the coequal Son of God, "God manifest in the flesh;" or calling upon the Father, by faith in the Son, and through his intercession: but the former sense best accords to the apostle's argument, and is by far the most obvious construction of the words. All believers thus "called on the name of the Lord Jesus;" (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, 1 Cor. 1:1,2.) and none else would, that is, humbly and sincerely: therefore all, whether Jews or Gentiles, who thus sought help from him, would be saved. But how should any call on the Lord Jesus, the divine Saviour, who had not believed in him? Or how could any believe in him, who had never heard of him or his salvation? Or how could the Gentiles hear the things pertaining to Christ, if none of the Jews, to whom they were immediately revealed, were sent by God, and by his church, to preach to them? Why then should the Jews blame the apostle and others, for engaging in this needful and benevolent work, to which God called them? (Marg. Ref. d—f. Note, 1 Thes. 2:13—16.)—The necessity and importance of preaching the gospel had been stated in strong terms by the prophet. (Marg. Ref. g—i. Notes, Is. 52:7,8. John 12:37—41.)—He had poetically described even the feet of those who proclaimed the gospel of peace, to be beautiful: and though the Gentiles had not generally welcomed the salvation of Christ, any more than the Jews, so as to receive it with an obedient faith: yet that too had been intimated by the same prophet, when he expressed his grief and surprise at men's general inattention to the glad tidings of salvation by a suffering Messiah. (Marg. Ref. k—n. Note, Is. 53:1.) Even the phrase which he used, when he called the gospel "our report," confirmed the foregoing argument, that faith generally came, by men's hearing a report of Christ, brought to them by the faithful preaching of the word of God. This is the means which God has appointed, and chiefly blessed for this purpose, and it is therefore man's duty to use it in expectation of his blessing.—The Christian church seems, during many ages, to have forgotten her obligation to send the gospel to the nations; but it has in our days been brought to remembrance. May it be acted on more and more!—The manner, in which the apostle applies the words to Christ, which Isaiah spoke of JEHOVAH, forms a strong proof of our Lord's Deity.—Feet, &c. (15) 'The feet of those who have travelled far, in a hot country, through rough and dusty roads, present a spectacle naturally offensive:... nevertheless, the consideration, that the persons themselves are, to us, the messengers of peace and felicity, would make us behold with delight this indication of their embassy. Haud indecoro pulvere sordidos. Horace.' Campbell.—The whole passage most clearly shows, that without calling on Christ none can be saved, that without faith none can call on him; and without the preaching, or publication in some way of the gospel, none can believe in him.—The awful state of the heathen nations, and our imperious duty towards them, can hardly be more strongly stated, nor the opinion of those who argue that multitudes will be saved by Jesus, who never heard of his name, more energetically reprobated.—How beautiful, &c. (15) From the Hebrew, omitting, "upon the mountains." 'The Sept. seems much corrupted here.' Randolph. (Is. 52:7.)—Lord, who, &c. CHAPTER XI.

The apostle shows, that God had not so cast off Israel, but that a remnant would be saved "according to the election of grace," by grace, not by works, 1—6; while the rest would be blinded, as foretold by the prophets, 7—10. He predicts that this exclusion would not be final; and states the consequences to the Gentiles, both of the fall of the Jews, and of their recovery, 11—15. He cautions the Gentile converts not to boast against the Jews, but humbly to profit by this example of God's severity and goodness; and foretells glorious times, which would at length arrive, 16—32. He adores the depths of God's wisdom, and the glory of his unsearchable judgments, his undesired all-sufficiency, and his universal and absolute sovereignty, 33—36.

I SAY then, [a]Hath God cast away his people? [b]God forbid. [c]For I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin.

2 God hath not cast away his people [d]which he foreknew. [e]Wot ye not what the Scripture saith 'of Elias? how he [f]maketh intercession to God against Israel, saying,

3 Lord, [g]they have killed thy prophets, and [h]digged down thine altars; and I am left alone, and they seek my life.

4 But what saith the answer of God unto him? [i]I have reserved to myself seven thousand men, who have not bowed the knee to the image of [k]Baal.

V. 18—21. As then, the "hearing of the report" concerning Christ was absolutely necessary to faith in him, and salvation by him; could it be said that the Jews had not had an opportunity of hearing it? Indeed the gospel had been so generally and extensively diffused, that the words of David, respecting the instructions conveyed to all nations, by the luminaries of heaven, (as typical of "the Sun of righteousness,") might be well applied to what had already taken place. (Marg. Ref. p—r. Note, Ps. 19:3—6.)—The Jews especially had almost universally heard the gospel. The apostles, the seventy disciples, and others, by the express command of the Lord, preached in the cities and villages of Judea and Galilee, for a long time, before they went to the Gentiles; and even Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles, constantly first preached to the Jews, in every city whither he went. Very few of that nation therefore could plead, that they had had no opportunity of hearing this report: and their unbelief was the effect, not of ignorance or want of instruction, but of obstinate enmity against the truth. Again, could Israelites plead, that no intimations had previously been given, that God intended to cast them off for their unbelief and disobedience, and to take others in their stead? Even Moses, in that prophetical song which all the people were commanded to learn throughout their generations, had represented JEHOVAH declaring, that he would excite them to jealousy by those who had been no people to him, and raise their indignation by his favours shown to a nation, which had been despised as foolish, because idolatrous. (Marg. Ref. s—u. Notes, Deut. 31:19. 32:21.) This had been most remarkably accomplished, in the virulent opposition to the gospel, which the calling of the Gentiles had excited in the Jews; when it should have stirred them up to a pious emulation, not to be surpassed in faith and holiness by those who had before been so ignorant and far from God.—Isaiah also, in very bold language, which must have given very great offence to his contemporaries, had introduced JEHOVAH declaring that he was found as a Saviour, and acceptably worshipped, by those who just before had not so much as sought for him; and that he had freely bestowed his favour and conferred his special grace on those, who had not previously made any inquiries after him: but in respect of Israel, he declared that "he had stretched out his hands" full of blessings, and with most earnest and affectionate invitations, to a "disobedient and preverse people." PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11. Faithful ministers bear most affectionate goodwill to those from whom they receive the greatest injuries; and offer their fervent and persevering prayers for the salvation of the very persons, against whom they denounce the wrath of God, if they persist in unbelief.—Careless and shameless profligates, infidels, and blasphemers are not the only persons who throng the broad road to destruction, but many also who have "a zeal for God" and religion. (Note, Matt. 7:13,14.) While therefore we should inculcate earnestness in that most important concern; we must also insist upon the absolute necessity of its being regulated by the word of God; without which even the most self-denying earnestness can do no more, than speciously deceive and ruin the souls of men.—Sinners could never persist in their vain endeavours to repair the baseless edifice of "their own righteousness;" if they knew either the justice of God as a Governor, or his righteousness as a Saviour. (Notes, 1:17—20. John 16:8—11.) But being, through heedlessness, pride, prejudice, and carnal enmity, ignorant both of the law and the gospel, they stand out against partial convictions; they do not allow the justice of the sentence denounced against them, as sinners deserving "the wrath of God;" and they will not submit to be saved by "the righteousness of faith," in the same way with the meanest and most criminal of the species. Manifold are their devices and endeavours to "establish their own righteousness;" but all their labour is lost, and their souls continue in the most imminent danger: for in opposition to all other methods of obtaining the divine favour, whether devised by ignorance, superstition, philosophy, enthusiasm, or grave morality, we must still insist upon it, that "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth;" and that every unbeliever remains under "the curse of the law," and "the wrath of God." If a man object to this, and adduce the difference between moral and ceremonial obedience, and argue that the former may help to justify a man though the latter cannot: let him hear "Moses describe the righteousness of the law," and then let him inquire whether he can claim eternal life according to it. Let him take the moral "law of God," (for rules which men prescribe, to themselves and to each other, are out of the question:) and having produced a sinless obedience to it, through the whole of his continuance here, in thought, word, and deed, let him then demand the reward as a debt. But if this be a desperate attempt; let him submit to the degradation of a criminal, and apply for pardon to the clemency of his offended Lord, and for eternal life as his free "gift through Jesus Christ," and by faith in him. (Note, 6:21—23. P. O. 16—23.)—The humble trembling sinner has, however, no cause for discouragement. "The righteousness of faith," as it were, invites him to accept of it; the Surety has finished his obedience and atonement, and is risen and exalted to be our all-prevailing Advocate. (Notes, 8:32—39. Heb. 7:23—28. 9:24—26. 1 John 2:1,2.) Nor need we cross the seas, or explore far distant climes, in quest of divine knowledge: this is brought nigh to us in the gospel; and if we receive it by living faith in our hearts, and confess that faith with our mouths in this evil world, without doubt the blessing is ours. But we should not trust in a faith, of which we are afraid or ashamed to make an open confession: much less ought we to depend on any mere confession of faith, or assent to divine truths, which we do not "believe in our hearts." For no faith is justifying, which is not efficacious in sanctifying the heart, and regulating all its affections in subserviency to the love of Christ. (Notes, Jam. 2:14—26.) Of such a faith no sinner shall be ashamed before God: and he ought therefore to glory in it before man. (Note, 5:3—5. Is. 45:15—17,23—25. Joel 2:26,27. 1 John 2:26—29.)

V. 12—21. In the great concerns of eternal salvation there is now "no difference" between one nation and another: for our rich and gracious Lord most willingly regards the desires of all "who call upon him;" and none receive the less, because of the numbers who share the blessings with them. As therefore faith (whence all true prayer proceeds) comes "by hearing the word of God;" we should take care to be found among those, who hear, believe, and obey the gospel; and we should zealously and diligently endeavour to communicate the same blessing to others, even to "the ends of the earth," with all the influence and talent which we possess; and with every self-denying exertion of which we are capable: that the "Sun of righteousness" may diffuse his healing beams, wherever the sun in the firmament gives light to mankind.—When we hear of the success of the gospel among the ignorant, the barbarous, or the profligate; instead of being displeased, as Pharisees are, we should cordially adore the riches and power of the grace of God, in its being thus "found of them who sought him not:" and we should excite ourselves and each other to a holy jealousy and increasing diligence; lest we should be left behind by those, who once were so far below us in spiritual advantages. Thus we shall obtain the assurance, that we are not of that immense number, to whom the Lord still says, "All day long have I stretched out my hands to a disobedient and gainsaying people," a people both unbelieving and disobedient. (Notes, Heb. 3:14—19. 1 Pet. 2:7,8.)

NOTES.—CHAP. XI. V. 1—6. The apostle here supposes, that in consequence of what he had stated (Note, 10:

5 Even so then [l]at this present time also there is a remnant according to the [m]election of grace.

6 And [n]if by grace, then is it no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace. But if it be of works, then is it no more grace: otherwise work is no more work.

18—21.) it would be inquired, whether God had utterly "cast away" his chosen people, Israel; and so failed of performing his promises to their fathers. This consequence, as deduced from his doctrine, he decidedly disavowed. Indeed the Lord could not so properly be said to have "cast them away," as they to have "cast him off," through their determined opposition to the kingdom and salvation of the promised Messiah, by which they forfeited their privileges. This appeared from the ready reception given to all those Jews, who were willing to become the disciples of Christ: of this, the apostle himself was a most remarkable instance; for, being a descendant of Abraham, and once a furious persecutor of the church, he was now become the apostle of Christ to the Gentiles. (Marg. Ref. a—c. Notes, Phil. 3:1—7. 1 Tim. 1:12—14.) God had not therefore "cast away his people, whom he had foreknown," as in due time to be called and justified, to whom especially his promises had respect; though he had left the rest to fall by their unbelief. (Marg. Ref. d. Note, 8:28—31.) But, as JEHOVAH had "reserved to himself" (by his special influence and agency) a considerable remnant in the days of Elijah, when the prophet was ready to conclude that "he alone was left" to serve him, and used such words in prayer, as might be considered as "interceding against Israel;" (Marg. and Marg. Ref. e—k. Notes, 1 Kings 19:10—14, 18.) so there was a remnant reserved of many ten thousand Jews, yea, a far greater proportion than was generally supposed, at that very period, when the nation was cast off from being the people of God. This remnant was reserved according to "the election of grace:" not because they were less undeserving of such favour than others: but because God was pleased to have mercy on them, for reasons which he had not seen good to reveal: otherwise they too would have perished in unbelief. (Note, 9:15—23.) If then this election was "of grace," it could not be "of works," either performed or foreseen; as this would imply that something naturally in the objects chosen determined the Lord's preference, and that it did not originate from his grace or unmerited mercy. For if, in any sense or degree, "it were of works," it would in part at least be of debt, and not of entire free favour; otherwise "work," as it stands related to election and justification, would lose its very nature. For an entire free favour must be absolutely distinct from a reward, conferred in consequence of some work performed: as the price of one farthing, paid for what is worth a thousand pounds, must in exact propriety of speech, essentially distinguish it from an entirely free gift. (Marg. Ref. l—n. Note, 4:4,5.)—This text is so decisive on the subject, that great pains have been taken to explain it away: but really the arguments of the most able and learned man, on the other side, prove nothing so much as the weakness of their cause. I shall therefore only observe in general; that in fact those are not always or even generally called, who, to our apprehension, are best disposed to perform good works, but the contrary, as the examples recorded in Scripture alone undeniably demonstrate; (Notes, Matt. 19:29,30. 21:28—32. Luke 13:22—30.) that every truly good disposition, in a fallen creature, must be the effect, and cannot therefore be the cause, of the grace of God bestowed on him; that God did not act without reason in choosing one rather than another, though we are not made acquainted with his reasons; and that the display of the infinite riches of his mercy, the omnipotence of his grace, and the glory of his own sovereignty, in converting the most unlikely persons in the world, are far more probable reasons of his choice, than any foreseen comparative goodness of natural disposition in those who are saved, above those that perish.—The election of grace. (5) 'Not those who chose grace, but those whom grace chose; that is, those whom God freely chose. Neither would "grace be grace," if we were in the smallest degree chosen for our foreseen good works; nor would "work be work," if in any measure it needed the help of grace.' Beza.—They have killed, &c. (3,4.) The first part comes nearer to the Hebrew, than to the LXX: the second, 'is plainly another translation, and seems to be a better one, of the Hebrew.' Randolph. (1 Kings 19:10,18.)

V. 7—10. What then was the precise state of the Jewish nation? In general they had not obtained that "justification unto life," which they sought for; because they clave to their own devices, and rejected the gospel of God: (Notes, 9:30—33. 10:1—4.) but "the election" or the chosen remnant among them, had obtained it, while "the rest were blinded:" so that the rejection of the latter was the punishment of their sins; but the calling of the former was neither the consequence, nor the reward, of their own works. "The election," here mentioned, as distinct from Israel, God's chosen people, (that is, an election within an election,) clearly marks the difference between an election of a people to special external privileges, and a personal choice of individuals to eternal life: and it refutes unanswerably the reasonings of those, who would confine all these Scriptures to the former kind of election, and exclude the latter. (Marg. Ref. o—q.)—This judicial blindness of the enemies of Christ, had been clearly foretold; and might have been previously expected. (Notes, Deut. 29:4. Ps. 69:22—28. Is. 6:9,10. 29:9—12. Acts 1:20—22.) These Scriptures have already been explained in this sense: but we may add, upon the version here given of David's words, that the provision made for the souls of the Jews, (as well as their temporal plenty,) was in righteous judgment, made the occasion of their being more deeply ensnared in guilt, and sinking under more dreadful condemnation, as the recompense of their unbelief; till at length they were totally blinded, and given up as slaves to the oppression of their enemies, to be bowed down continually with the heavy burdens laid upon them: an emblem of their base and ruinous bondage to sin and Satan. (8) 'This by no means implies, that God infuses any new viciousness; but that he, as a just Judge, delivers up those, who are destitute of his grace, unto Satan and to their own lusts, to be more and more blinded.' Beza. This venerable reformer certainly adopts, what is generally called the supralapsarian doctrine; and ventures on expressions, which few modern Calvinists (as they are called) would subscribe: yet he by no means admits those consequences, which numbers, who "speak evil of what they understand not," indiscriminately charge on all, who hold the doctrine of personal election to eternal life. (Notes, Ex. 4:21. 2 Thes. 2: 8—12.) The apostle seems to have given the sense of the several prophecies to this effect referred to, rather than the exact words from the Septuagint, or a literal translation from the Hebrew. 'The Septuagint, after the usual way of this translation, puts the optative,' (or rather, the imperative,) 'for what is, in the Hebrew, the future.' Randolph. This is, I apprehend, often done very improperly; but here the context requires it: as several verbs, in the same passage, are imperative. (Ps. 69:22—28.)

V. 11—15. The apostle had shown that Israel was not totally "cast off;" (Note, 1—6.) and he next inquired, whether the nation in general had so stumbled, as finally to be excluded from all further share in the blessings covenanted

13 For I speak to you Gentiles, inasmuch as I am [b]the apostle of the Gentiles, I magnify mine office:

14 If [i]by any means I may [k]provoke to emulation them which are [l]my flesh, and [m]might save some of them.

15 For if [n]the casting away of them be [o]the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, [p]but life from the dead?

16 For [q]if the first-fruit be holy, the lump is also holy: and if the root be holy, so are the branches.

17 And if [s]some of the branches be broken off, and thou, [t]being a wild olive-tree, wert graffed in [u]among them, [u]and with them partakest of the root and fatness of the olive-tree;

18 [x]Boast not against the branches. But if thou boast, [y]thou bearest not the root, but the root thee.

19 Thou wilt say then, The branches were broken off, [z]that I might be graffed in.

20 [a]Well; [b]because of unbelief they were broken off, [c]and thou standest by faith. [d]Be not high-minded, [e]but fear:

21 For [f]if God spared not the natural branches, take heed lest he also spare not thee.

to their fathers: or whether God had no further end in that mysterious dispensation, than merely their fall and ruin. He would by no means admit either of these suppositions: for it actually appeared, that the Lord intended, "through the unbelief" of the Jews, to communicate his salvation to the Gentiles. The persecution of the Christians in Judea drove them into other regions: and the Jews, in every place rejecting the gospel, excited the preachers more speedily and openly to address the Gentiles; by which means, very large multitudes had been "turned from idols to serve the living God." (Notes, Acts 8:1,4. 11:19—21. 13:42—48. 1 Thes. 1:9, 10.) Yet even this was suited to excite the Jews to a holy jealousy, and an emulation with the Gentile worshippers, in zeal for the service of JEHOVAH, and earnestness in seeking the blessings of the Messiah's kingdom; though it too generally had the contrary effect, through their pride and prejudices. (Marg. Ref. c—e. Note, 10:18—21.) If then "their fall" had been overruled for "the enriching of the world" in general with the blessings of the gospel; if the diminution of the numbers of that long-favoured people, by the exclusion of so large a part of them from the visible church, and the subsequent judgments inflicted on them, was the occasion of communicating such rich blessings, to immense numbers of the benighted Gentiles; how much more would their conversion, when the whole nation should, in one full body, acknowledge their long-despised Messiah! For this, they have ever since been preserved a distinct people, almost by a continued miracle: (Notes, Num. 23:9. Jer. 30:10,11.) and as their conversion will fulfil so very many ancient prophecies concerning their restoration, and will probably be effected by the fulfilment of many other prophecies; so it will doubtless exceedingly conduce to the conversion of the remaining heathen nations. (Marg. Ref. f, g. Notes, Lev. 26:40—42. Deut. 4:29—31. 30:1—10. Is. 11:11—16. 63:15—19. 64: Jer. 32:39—41. Ez. 34:23—31. 36:25—27,31. 37:25—28. 39:23—29. Hos. 3:4, 5. Joel 3:9—21. Am. 9:13—15. Mic. 5:7—9. 7:18—20. Zeph. 3:14—17. Zech. 8:20—23 10:5—12. 12:6—14.) Paul, addressing himself to the Gentile converts, (though he was aware that many both of the Jewish Christians and the unconverted Jews would read his arguments,) spoke in the character of "the apostle of the Gentiles," by the special designation of Christ; and aimed to commend and magnify that office, as honourable to himself, and most important for the good of mankind. At the same time, by a most judicious and delicate turn, he represented his zeal for the conversion of the Gentiles, as animated by the desire of stirring up his brethren the Jews, whom he regarded as "his own flesh," to emulate their faith and aspire to their privileges; that thus he might be instrumental in saving some of them also, though he knew that the sentence denounced upon the nation was irreversible. (Marg. Ref. h—m.)—The English word "provoke," being now fixed in common use to the idea of exciting indignation, is very apt to perplex the reader's mind, and to prevent his clearly seeing, that the apostle spoke of exciting them to holy and not to unholy passions; the latter indeed was generally the event of his conduct, but contrary to his intentions. (Note, Heb. 10:23—25.)—As, therefore, the righteous rejection of the unbelieving Jews had proved the occasion of so large a multitude of the Gentiles, throughout the world, being reconciled to God and walking at peace with him; what would their future reception into the church introduce, but such a change as would resemble a general resurrection of the 'dead in sin to a life of righteousness,' in every part of the world; and a proportionable increase of spiritual life to all who before had believed? This event will accomplish so many prophecies, in so open and signal a manner, that infidelity in every form must be finally confuted and silenced: and the attention of the most heedless must be excited to the astonishing display of the power of God, in performing his word: and, as "he delighteth in mercy," he will effectually concur with these impressions, by pouring out his Holy Spirit to convert the nations, and to render genuine Christianity universally triumphant; probably to a very great degree by ministers and missionaries of converted Israel. V. 16—21. The apostle here speaks of Israel, as the visible church of God, the repository of his oracles and ordinances; the vineyard which he had inclosed and planted, but which he was now about to leave desolate. (Notes, Is. 5:1—7.) The attentive reader will readily perceive, that relative holiness, or consecration to God, is here exclusively meant. "The first-fruits" of the dough, being presented to God, sanctified, as it were, the whole lump to the use of his people: (Marg. Ref. q. Note, Lev. 23:10—14.) thus the patriarchs, "the first-fruits" of Israel, being chosen and set apart with their seed after them, as "a holy people to the LORD," through all their generations; a measure of this relative sanctity attached to their posterity, notwithstanding their rebellions and visitations; in consequence of which, all their males were circumcised on the eighth day, as the professed people and worshippers of JEHOVAH. (Notes, 1 Cor. 7:10—14.) But another similitude more aptly illustrated this subject: "if the root" of the tree were "holy," the branches must be supposed to be the same. Now Abraham was, as it were, the root of the visible church in all subsequent ages. After Ishmael and the sons of Keturah had been broken off, the tree grew up in Isaac: then Esau being broken off, it shot forth abundance of branches, in Jacob and his twelve sons. When any Gentiles were converted, or proselyted, they were "grafted into this tree" by circumcision, as long as the legal dispensation lasted: (but by baptism after the Christian dispensation entered;) and they, with their posterity, were from that time considered as branches of the tree, a part of the visible church as springing from Abraham. (Marg. Ref. r—u.) Notwithstanding all former rebellions, the Jews were the branches of this tree, till as a nation they rejected the Messiah; (though the most of the ten tribes had long before been broken off;) but after that, their relation to Abraham and to God, was, as it were, suspended. They were broken off from the olive-tree in immense multitudes: they were cast out of the church, as the children of the bondwoman, or as profane Esau: (Notes, Gal. 4:21—31. Heb. 12:15—17.) neither they, nor their posterity any longer retained even the outward seal of the covenant; for circumcision lost its validity, and baptism became the sign of regeneration, and "the seal of the righteousness of faith:" and they were thenceforth deprived of the ordinances of God. (Notes, 4:9—12. John 15:1—5.) At the same time, the Gentiles "were grafted" into this tree, in their room: by professing faith in Christ, and being baptized into his name, they were admitted into the visible church of God, and attained a relative holiness; they were favoured with the means of grace, and the ordinances of God, "for their good, and that of their children after them," as the Jews formerly had been; and multitudes, who had been the branches of the wild unfruitful olive-tree, were thus made heirs of Abraham's faith, holiness, and blessedness. (Notes, Gal. 3:26—29. Heb. 6:16—20.) Yet the Gentile Christians ought by no means to copy the Jews by becoming proud of this distinction: or boasting over those who had been broken off to make room for them. But if any of them were disposed to do this, they should recollect that they were not the root of this well-cultured, fruitful tree; nor had they naturally sprung from it, but of free grace had been grafted in to share its advantages. Abraham's race had derived no spiritual good from them; but they derived all from Abraham's race: and indeed all the knowledge of the true God and of true religion in the world to this day is derived from them.—The Gentile converts might indeed say, that "the natural branches had been broken off" to make way for them, and it was true that God had thus preferred them; yet it was not on account of their works, but of entirely free grace. "Through unbelief," the effect of pride, "the Jews had been broken off," and "through faith" the Gentiles had been grafted in: they ought 22 Behold [s]therefore the goodness and severity of God: on them which fell, severity; but toward thee, goodness, [h]if thou continue in his goodness: [i]otherwise thou also shalt be cut off.

23 And they also, [k]if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be graffed in: for God is able to graff them in again.

24 For [l]if thou wert cut out of the olive-tree which is wild by nature, and were graffed contrary to nature into a good olive-tree; how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be graffed into their own olive-tree?

[Practical Observations.]

26 And so [r]all Israel shall be saved: as it is written, [s]There shall come out of Sion the Deliverer, [t]and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob:

therefore to beware of self-confidence, self-preference, and every kind of pride or ambition; lest, having only a dead faith, and an empty profession, they should apostatize from God and forfeit their privileges. For if he had not spared the natural branches; they ought surely to fear lest they too should be broken off. (Marg. Ref. x—f.)—This doubtless refers to the collective body of professing Christians, and not to individual believers: though the latter are preserved, through humility and holy fear. It has also a peculiar prophetic energy, when we consider it as addressed to the Roman church, which so soon after, attempting to domineer over other churches, to be the metropolis of the Christian world, and at length to be infallible, fell through pride and presumption; till it became "the mother of harlots, and of abominations of the earth." (Notes, Rev. 17:1—6.)—It is obvious to observe, that, though the illustration of grafting excellently suited the apostle's purpose, yet the effect, in the case before us, is the reverse of that in natural grafting: for there the good cion communicates its changing efficacy to the wild stock; here, the stock imparts its efficacy to the corrupt oranches, which by divine power are grafted into it.—The apostle's reasoning, in this place, strongly evinces the oneness of the visible church under every dispensation; and the change of the initiatory ordinance since the coming of Christ is manifest: his statement therefore implies more substantial arguments in favour of infant-baptism, than has generally been supposed.—'We ought indeed to glory in God; ... but not so as to despise the Jews, whom it becomes us rather to excite to a holy emulation. ... And they doubtless do suffer, and will suffer, the punishment of this neglected duty who at this day call themselves Christians, and yet, impelled only by their own wickedness and perverseness of mind, by all means vex that holy people, (as it respects their fathers;) and also harden them more and more, by setting before them the examples of the basest and most insane attachment to idols. But indeed, I would daily and most willingly thus pray for the Jews: O Lord Jesus, thou indeed justly avengest the contempt of thyself, and that ungrateful people is worthy of thy severest judgments; but, O Lord, remember thy covenant, and pity them for thy name's sake. ... And grant unto us, the most unworthy of all men, whom nevertheless thou hast distinguished by thy mercy, that, making proficiency in thy grace, we may not be the instruments of thine anger against them; but that rather, both by the knowledge of thy word, and by the example of a holy life, we may through the power of thy Spirit, recall them into the right way: that thou mayest be glorified for ever by all nations and people. Amen.' Beza.

V. 22—24. Instead of glorying over the rejected Jews, or glorying in themselves, the Gentile converts ought to contemplate, with admiration, awe, and gratitude, the unmerited "goodness," and the righteous "severity" of God: on the fallen Jews, "severity," but to themselves, most astonishing "goodness." Yet it was proper to add, "if they continued in that goodness," that is, if in humble faith they received, and lived in persevering dependence on the grace displayed in the gospel. (Marg. Ref. g—i. Notes, John 8:30—36. 15:3—11. Acts 11:23,24. 14:21—23. Col. 1:21—23. 1 John 2:26—29. Jude 20,21.) But if any of them, either personally or collectively, were unbelieving and presumptuous, and renounced the truth, they too would be "cut off." Whereas if the Jews were not obstinate in their unbelief, they would be "grafted in again:" which might be easily accomplished by the divine power. For if God had taken the Gentiles, as "branches of the wild olive-tree," the descendants of those, who for so many ages had been ignorant and licentious idolaters; and had, by his word and Spirit, "grafted them in" among his own people and worshippers; doubtless he would much more in due time graft the Jews, the natural branches, into their own Olive-Tree.—This was spoken prophetically, both respecting the apostacy of the Roman church, and the future conversion of the Jews. (Marg. Ref. k, l. Note, 2 Thes. 2:3,4.)—'This "grafting in again," seems to import, that the Jews shall be a flourishing nation again, professing Christianity in the land of promise; for that is to be reinstated again in the promise made to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. This, St. Paul might, for good reasons, be withheld from speaking out here: but in the prophets there are very plain intimations of it.' Locke.

V. 25—32. Perhaps the apostle was aware, that "the mystery of iniquity already wrought," in the church at Rome; and therefore laboured the more to check its fatal progress. (Note, 2 Thes. 2:5—7.) He would not have them remain "ignorant" of the mysterious purposes of God, respecting his ancient people, lest their present advantageous distinction should render them proud of their own wisdom. (Notes, 12: 14—16. Prov. 3:5—8. 26:12,16. Is. 5:21.) The Lord, in righteous sovereignty, had permitted "blindness in part" to happen even to Israel: not a partial but a total blindness in spiritual things; but it extended only to a part of the nation, for "the election" was preserved from it. (Note, 7—10.) This would continue to be the case, till the happy period arrived, for the conversion of the fulness of the Gentiles. (Note, Luke 21:20—24.) In the intermediate ages, immense numbers would be gathered into the church; but, about the time of the last great harvest of the nations, "the blindness" will be removed from Israel, and the nation saved from its rejected and dispersed state, and be brought in a body to embrace the gospel: probably it will be restored to the holy land, and most of the Jews at least will become true believers. (Marg. Ref. m—r. Note, 11—15.) This accords to a prophecy, which predicts the spiritual coming of Christ, to "turn away from" the nation of "Israel ungodliness," impenitence, unbelief, and enmity to his kingdom and salvation; that, by thus removing the guilt and power of their sins, his covenant may again be ratified with them. (Marg. Ref. s—u. Note, Is. 59:20,21.) The Jews indeed by their rejection of the gospel, and their indignation at its being preached to the Gentiles, were considered as "enemies" to God; which was overruled for the calling of the Gentiles through special love to them: yet, in regard to the original election of that people in Abraham, and the immense number of elect persons, who are yet to spring from them, they are still to be favoured, for the sake of their pious fathers. (Notes, Is. 6:13. 65:8—10. Matt. 24:21,22.) For God will, in his persevering love and kindness to that race through all ages, show that, however he is said to repent of his threatenings and judgments, and is thus better than his word; yet he never repents, or is said to repent, of his special gifts, or distinguished favours, promised to fallen man, or conferred on him. So that, as the Gentiles, who had once no knowledge of God, had at length "obtained mercy, through the unbelief" of the Jews, and by means of preachers of that nation; even so the unbelieving Jews might at length "obtain mercy, through the mercy" shown to the Gentiles, and at length receive the gospel from them, and from preachers raised up among them. For God had alternately left both of them in unbelief, shut up as in a prison, for the appointed time; in order, that at length he might have mercy on them all, by bringing both Jews and Gentiles, even all nations, to the knowledge of his salvation by faith in Jesus Christ. (Marg. Ref. y—h.)—The principal conversion of Jews, in the times of the apostles, had taken place before this epistle was written; and it is evident that the conversion predicted is yet future.—There shall come, &c. (26,27.) Not exactly either from the Sept. or the Hebrew; yet the general meaning is the same, and the variation does not at all affect the argument. It is, however, most evident, that the apostle, even when writing to the Gentiles, who in general had no copy of the Scriptures but the Septuagint, did not uniformly quote from it. (Is. 59:20,21.)

V. 33—36. 'The apostle breaks forth in this exclamation, as filled with astonishment, at the exceedingly admirable wisdom of God; which, he also thus teaches, should be piously and reverently adored, and not profanely and curiously searched into, beyond the boundaries of revelation.' Beza.—St. Paul had gone as far, in unravelling, illustrating, and vindicating, the mysterious purposes and decrees of God, as was suitable or profitable: yet he well knew, that much darkness and difficulty must still rest on them; and that presumption, pride, and unbelief would still multiply inquiries, and objections. (Notes, 2 Pet. 3:14—16.) Thus he gave no countenance, either to those who, with absurd arrogance, attempt to reduce all possible existence, truth, and knowledge, to the measure of their own intellect, and to believe no more than they can comprehend; or to those, who know no end of speculating, and of arguing from revealed truths to unrevealed causes and consequences, as they suppose them to be. Instead of this, he closed the subject, by breaking forth into admiration and adoration of the unfathomable depth, and infinite treasures, of the wisdom and knowledge of God. His views are immense and eternal; and his reasons, for every part of his vast designs, are taken from himself, and his purpose of glorifying his own perfections: (Marg. Ref. k. Notes, Prov. 16:4. Eph. 1:3—8,13,14. 2:4—10. 3:9—12.) to us, therefore, they must be impenetrable and inexplicable, but they are all consistent with the riches, or infinite abundance, of his justice, truth, love, and mercy. His judgments and decrees, and his wisdom in them, cannot be fully investigated, or comprehended, by any created being; much less by us fallen creatures. His dealings with his creatures cannot be "traced out;" for they are an immense deep, where his footsteps cannot be known or traced. We should then be satisfied to understand, and receive by faith, the information which he graciously reveals: and to believe, that he acts with perfect wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness, when we cannot comprehend what he is doing; or when his dispensations seem to us not reconcileable to these his essential perfections. This must be the duty of created intelligences; for what being has an intuitive acquaintance with the mind of the great Creator, that he should be able to discover his unrevealed designs? Or, who can say, that he has counselled the most High, and therefore understands his intentions, and can unravel his decrees? Or who has first given any thing to the Lord? or rendered him any service, previous to his having received so much from him, as to be bound by the strongest obligations to devote his all to him? If any can prove, that the Lord is thus indebted to him, he shall certainly be recompensed: but all such claims, and all men's disputations against his decrees, dispensations, truths, and precepts, involve in them the most irrational arrogance, nay, the most horrible blasphemy. (Marg. Ref. m, n. Notes, Job 41:1—11, v. 11. Is. 40:12—17. Jer. 23:18. Dan. 4:34—37. 1 Cor. 2:14—16.) For of Him, as the self-existent, all-sufficient, and eternal Fountain of being and perfection, all creatures were originally derived: by and through Him they all subsist, are provided for, and disposed of: and to Him they all are, or ought to be, wholly devoted; and in one way or other, they all shall proclaim, or display, the glory of his perfections, and the honour of his great name. (Marg. Ref. o, p. Notes, Col. 1:15—17. Heb. 1:3,4.) Instead therefore of murmuring and objecting, all men should, and all believers will, most cordially say, "To Him be glory for ever. Amen."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10. God never "casts away those, whom he hath foreknown," and "predestinated to be conformed to the image of his Son;" and if this seal of conformity to Christ be affixed to our souls, we may be assured of his everlasting favour, and all the felicity which springs from it. (Notes, 2 Cor. 1:21,22. Eph. 1:13,14.) We may also cheerfully hope, that he "has reserved for himself" a far larger proportion of believers in the worst of times, than fall under our cognizance, or comport with any of our computations: and, instead of "making intercession against" the multitudes of worthless professors of Christianity, with whom we are on all sides surrounded; we should still hope and pray, that "a remnant according to the election of grace," may yet be gathered even from among them. For, as our salvation originated wholly from the grace of God, so we may expect to see that grace abound in the conversion of the chief of sinners, of every description. But while the whole glory of salvation must be given to the grace of God, sinners perish for their own wickedness: (Notes, Jam. 1:13—18.) and those who seek his favour in unauthorised ways, will never obtain it. Numbers are thus left to be "blinded," and given up to "the spirit of slumber," and to presumptuous confidence; till all their advantages are so misused, that they help to ensnare and harden them, and bind them fast in the bondage of Satan: and it is only by the mercy of God, that any of us are preserved from these various strong delusions, which might justly have been awarded us, as the recompense of our pride and ungodliness.

V. 11—15. The Lord overrules the fall and ruin of some, to the salvation of others. His awful judgments, on daring transgressors, frequently warn their companions or neighbours to "flee from the wrath to come:" and on the other hand, the conversion of notorious sinners sometimes excites others to inquire after Christ and salvation. But what extensive, permanent, and most glorious effects may be produced, in the whole creation of God, through eternal ages, by the fall of angels and men, by redemption in Christ, and by the dispensations of God towards his church and the world, who can tell? However, a hint of this, a glimpse as it were of the invisible world, should remind us, that the Lord may have ten thousand wise and gracious reasons, for his most severe and terrible judgments, of which we can form no conception. Thus the fall of the Jews was the occasion of the Gentiles being enriched with the unsearchable treasures of Christ; and his justice, truth, and wisdom were glorified in that awful dispensation: yet their eyes were so blinded, that they could see no glory in it.—We, the ministers of the gospel, however mean and unworthy in ourselves, should "magnify our office," as conducing unspeakably more to enrich and bless mankind, (provided it be faithfully executed,) than all arts, sciences, commerce, or improvements whatever, unitedly ever have done, or can do. While we labour for the conversion of those, among whom we are called to minister, we should have respect also to others, and even to those who are most prejudiced against us; i by any means we can "excite them to emulation," or do any thing "to save some of them;" for they too are "our own flesh." The Lord overrules his works of judgment, to the reconciling of sinners to himself, for he "delighteth in mercy:" and he will ere long display his glorious power, by making the salvation of one people the introduction to that of others, especially in the restoration of Israel; till "life from the dead" shall be communicated to all the nations of the earth.

CHAPTER XII.

The apostle exhorts Christians, "by the mercies of God," to devote themselves to him; and avoiding conformity to the world, to be conformed to his holy will, 1, 2; to think humbly and soberly of themselves, as members of one body in Christ, 3—5; to exercise faithfully their different gifts, and perform the duties of their several stations, for the common benefit, 6—8; to mutual love, diligence, patience, hope, prayer, hospitality, compassion, and condescension, 9—16; to a peaceable, forgiving, and becoming conduct towards all men; and to a persevering kindness to enemies; as vengeance belongeth unto God, 17—21.

I [a]BESEECH you therefore, brethren, [b]by the mercies of God, [c]that ye present your bodies [d]a living sacrifice, holy, [e]acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service.

Jam. 4:6. 1 Pet. 5: 5. 3 John 9.

V. 16—24. While we wait and pray for the approaching happy times to the church; let us be thankful for our engrafting, as "branches of the wild olive-tree," into the holy tree "the church of the living God," to "partake of the root and fatness of it;" that "the blessing of Abraham might come on us Gentiles, by faith." (Notes, Gal. 3:10—14. Heb. 12:22—25.) But let the state of those, who were "the natural branches" of this tree, warn us not to rest in external profession or external advantages: and not to boast and glory against others, or to prefer ourselves, or indulge carnal security. (Notes, 1 Cor. 10: 1—12. Jude 5—8.) If we stand at all, it is "by faith:" this implies that we are guilty, polluted, and helpless in ourselves; and warns us to be humble, watchful, and afraid of self-deception, or of being overcome by temptation. Let us also observe, that we are not only at first "justified by faith:" (Note, 5:1,2.) but preserved to the end in that justified state by faith only; yet, by a faith which is not alone, but which is attended by humble repentance, and "worketh by love" of God and man.—Alas! how has the once flourishing church of Rome fallen, by neglecting the apostle's caution! And now many other churches, and what an immense number of individuals, have in a measure, trodden the same path! But blessed are those "who fear always," and "walk humbly with God;" who contemplate, with holy awe and fervent gratitude, "the severity and the goodness" of the Lord, as revealed in his word, and displayed in his providence; who are thus led to be "sober, and to watch unto prayer;" who by living faith "continue in his goodness," and wait for its complete effect in their eternal salvation. But if any presume that they are "the peculiar people of God," and despise others, they will at length be cut off, and cast as unfruitful branches into the fire; while such as have been most estranged from the truth, will find admission to all the privileges of the gospel, if they abide not in unbelief.

V. 25—36. As pride is the genuine offspring of ignorance, so an enlarged spiritual knowledge of the mysterious truths and dispensations of God, tends to prevent our being "wise in our own conceits." His dealings with his creatures appear very different, when viewed in detached parts, from what they will do, when seen as constituting a most glorious whole.—Zion's great Deliverer saves none from wrath, but those who are separated "from ungodliness;" for his covenant with his people ensures their sanctification, as well as their justification. His "gifts and calling are without repentance," in respect of his true church: this he has shadowed forth in his dealings with Israel as a nation. Their captivities, dispersions, and exclusion from the church, are emblems of the believer's corrections and rebukes for his transgressions: and the continued favour of the Lord towards that people, and the final mercy, and most blessed restoration, shortly intended for them, denote the persevering patience and victorious love of God, to those whom he has "chosen in Christ before the foundation of the world," and will finally save for his sake. As we therefore have obtained mercy, through the unbelief of the Jews; let us pray, and use all proper means as we can, that through our mercy they may speedily obtain mercy. Instead of perplexing our minds about secret things, let us walk in the light which the Lord has graciously afforded us: and, conscious of our inability to comprehend his deep designs, let us adore the depth of the riches of his wisdom and knowledge, whose judgments are not to be investigated, nor his ways traced out; whose mind none can penetrate or comprehend; who needs and regards no counsellor; who first gives life and breath and all things to every one; and to whom none can render any thing, which he has not first received from him. "For of him, and through him, and to him are all things, to whom be glory for ever. Amen." (Notes, 1 Chr. 29:1—19. Dan. 4:28—37. 5:18—24.)

NOTES.—CHAP. XII. V. 1. The apostle, having closed the doctrinal and argumentative part of his epistle, (which is throughout so carefully guarded, as to be of a very practical tendency,) proceeds here to enforce more particularly a variety of important duties from evangelical principles. He entreated, or exhorted, the Romans, as his brethren in Christ, most earnestly and affectionately, "by the mercies of God" shown to them, in their election, redemption, conversion, and their most abundant privileges; that they would evidence "the sincerity of their love," and honour the gospel, by "presenting their bodies as a living sacrifice unto" him. The allusion seems to be made to the living animals, which were "presented" as sacrifices before the altar, that they might be slain, and thus offered to God upon it. Thus Christians should "present their bodies" before God, to be employed in his service, and to be spent and worn out by hardships or labours for him; that so they might be wholly devoted to his glory. The body with its members, senses, and organs, is the instrument of the carnal mind, in executing its purposes, and gratifying its evil inclinations: when therefore the mind is made spiritual, the body should, in like manner, execute its holy purposes and express its spiritual affections. (Marg. Ref. a—c. Notes, 6:12—19.) Thus the soul becomes the consecrated priest and the body "the living sacrifice unto God through Jesus Christ." (Marg Ref. d. Notes, Phil. 4:14—20. Heb. 13:15,16. 1 Pet. 2:4—6. Rev. 1:4—6.) In general, this sacrifice must be presented alive, to be employed in the worship and work of God; though sometimes at length the body must also be offered up to death by martyrdom. (Notes, 14:7—9. Phil. 1:19,20.) As the legal sacrifices (which that of Christ has now superseded) were required to be "without spot or blemish;" so the bodies of believers must be separated from the practice of all iniquity, or they cannot be meet to be "living sacrifices to God;" but, being sanctified by the Holy Spirit, the worship and obedience performed by them, as the instruments of the renewed soul, are far more pleasing and honourable to God, than legal sacrifices in themselves could be. This is "a reasonable service" and worship, suited to rational creatures, and to their relations and obligations to God, as redeemed sinners: whereas the oblation of bulls and goats, though appointed by the Lord, when separated from its typical meaning, was not, in itself, "a reasonable service:" how much less, then, can human inventions, and the observance of human traditions, be "a reasonable service!" (Marg. Ref. e.)

V. 2. In thus wholly dedicating themselves to the service of God, Christians must go entirely against "the course of this world;" and incur the censure, ridicule, or enmity of ungodly men, which will often greatly interfere with their worldly interests. (Note, Eph. 2:1,2.) They ought not therefore to seek happiness from the world; or conform to the maxims, customs, and fashions of mankind in general. They must not comply with common usages, as to their pursuits or employments, in any respect; where such usages are contrary to the holy commands of God, the spirit of the gospel, the interests of piety, the prosperity of their own souls, and the improvement of their talents. In all these things the reproach of singularity is honourable, the want of it suspicious; and to be fashionable is to be unchristian.—A serious regard to this, and a few other maxims of a similar nature, would soon show men, in what things they must "not be conformed to this world:" and would convince them that, on the one hand affected singularity, in things minute or indifferent, comes far short of the spirituality of the exhortation; and on the other hand, that they excuse their vain amusements, splendid decorations, expensive feastings, eager pursuits of wealth, power, or distinction, waste of time, and other parts of their conduct; because they love the friendship of the world, "savour earthly things," and cannot endure self-denial, or the cross; not because they can fairly prove that the maxims and customs of the world, in these respects, are so agreeable to the spirit of the gospel, that they may safely conform to them. (*Marg. (Marg. Ref. g. Notes, Eph. 4:24—24. Col. 3:7—11.) This "transformation" of the soul into the holy image of Christ; this daily renovation of the understanding, judgment, and affections by the power of the Holy Spirit, is the only effectual cure of "conformity to this world;" because it produces conformity to "the spirits of just men made perfect;" and a capacity for delighting in such society and employments, as most resemble the inhabitants, worship, and joys of heaven. Animated, urgent, and affectionate exhortations to seek this inward transformation, as essential to duty and happiness, are the appointed and proper means of leading Christians to plead the promises, and attend on the ordinances, of God, in order to attain unto it more and more. Thus they "prove," or make trial of and experience, the happiness to be found in obeying the salutary, excellent, and holy "will of God," made known in his spiritual law, and now enforced by the blessed gospel: they manifest their cordial approbation of it, and show to others its excellency and beneficial tendency. (Notes, 7:9—14.) This alone can be "an acceptable service" to God, being perfect in its own nature, and suited to the perfecting of the soul in holiness; and then the body will indeed be "presented as a living sacrifice unto him." (Marg. Ref. h, i. Note, 1.)—There does not appear in these verses any distinction intended between the Jewish and Gentile converts; or any reason to conclude, as some have done, that the Gentiles were especially addressed. The customs and practices of the unbelieving Jews were as little to be conformed to by Christians, as those of the heathen were; and the case is exactly the same in respect of a vast majority, in countries called Christian.—The Jews were no longer required to offer the legal sacrifices, the Gentiles must renounce their idolatrous sacrifices; and were not required to keep the ritual law; but both were bound to devote themselves to God in holy obedience.

V. 3—5. The preceding general exhortation was in the affectionate style of brotherly love, but this is in that of apostolical authority. According to the distinguishing favour shown to him, in his call to be "the apostle of the Gentiles," St. Paul charged the Romans to beware of spiritual pride, to which their distinguished situation might peculiarly expose them. (11:20,25.) Let no one of them, however eminent for rank, abilities, learning, or endowments of any kind, "think more highly of himself," than consisted with the truth of his case and character, as a sinner saved by grace alone. Let none forget the Giver of his peculiar distinctions, the end for which they were bestowed, and the improvement required of them. (Note, 1 Cor. 4:6,7.) Let none overrate his own talents, as if they entitled him to superiority over others, or authorized his emulation and ambition. But let every one soberly and prudently estimate his own gifts and attainments, according as the Lord had dispensed to every man his "proportion of faith," and the benefits connected with it: that he might neither bury his talent in the earth, as undervaluing it; nor yet grow proud of it, or above the duties of his proper station in the church: or aspire after those places for which he was not qualified; or envy and oppose such as filled them. (Marg. Ref. k—m. Notes, 9—13, v. 10. Eph. 4:1—6. Phil. 2:1—8.) In short, every one of them ought to be in the church, as the members are in the human body: where each is fitted for its place, and, as it were, contented in it, and there quietly performs its proper function for the good of the whole. Thus united to Christ the Head, animated by one Spirit, and endued with different gifts, Christians are the members of one mystical body, and should seek the welfare of the whole body, in humble diligence, disinterested love, and unambitious quietness. (Marg. Ref. n, o. Notes, 1 Cor. 12:12—31.)—Think more highly, &c. (3) 'That he be not immoderately pleased with himself, as proud and ambitious persons are, who seem to themselves more wise than they really are.... It behooves every one,... to be conscious of those gifts, which he has received of the Lord, that he may perform his duty with a good conscience. But there are two boundaries, within which the sobriety and moderation, required by the apostle, are included. The one, that we arrogate nothing to ourselves, which we do not possess: the other, that we do not glory in what we have received, but use them, as gifts conferred on us, with trembling, to the glory of God.' Beza. (Notes, Matt. 25:14—30. Luke 19:11—27.)—The measure of faith.] It is commonly said, that faith is here put for those spiritual gifts, which were conferred on believers, and exercised in proportion to the measure of their faith. Yet it is evident, that in some instances even miraculous powers were possessed by those, who had not saving faith. (Notes, Matt. 7:21—23. 17:19—21. 21:21,22. 1 Cor. 13. 1—3.)—'For πιστεως, (faith,) in one manuscript we find χαριτος,' grace. Beza.

V. 6—8. As God, the Giver of "every good and perfect gift," had imparted to each Christian abilities, providential advantages, spiritual gifts, miraculous powers, or qualifications for that office in the church to which he had been called; and as none had any claim upon God for the least of these benefits, which he had an undoubted right to bestow, in that measure and proportion which he saw good, as an act of entire grace and favour; so every one ought to be satisfied in his place, and with his work, and ability to perform it. (Marg. Ref. p. Note, 1 Pet. 4:9—11.) If any one, therefore, were endued with the gift of prophecy, and was enabled to foretell future events, to deliver any message from God, or to explain his word for the edification of the church; (Notes, 1 Cor. 12:1—11. 14:1—5,20—25.) let him exercise this gift according to his ability, which would be in proportion to the degree of faith, by which he depended on the teaching of the Holy Spirit: or, (as some explain it,) let him show himself to be truly inspired, by speaking in entire consistency with "the analogy of faith," or that system of divine truth, which God had made known to his church by his prophets and apostles. 'Let no one rashly pour out what has not been revealed.' Camero, in Leigh.—If a man were called to the office of a deacon, in receiving and dispensing the alms and oblations of believers, among the poor, the sick, the prisoners, or others; or in any other way to minister to the common benefit, by managing the concerns of the church; (Note, Acts 6:2—6.) let him faithfully, diligently, and steadfastly attend to that good work, and serve Christ and his brethren in it. If another were called to teach young persons, or new converts, the first principles of Christianity, or to instruct them in the truth and will of God; let him give himself up to the duties of that station, well satisfied with his work: and let him neither envy his superiors, nor despise those beneath him. If another were called to the higher functions of the pastoral office, by authoritatively counselling, encouraging, exhorting, admonishing, instructing, or reproving his fellow-Christians; let him be chiefly concerned to fulfil his ministry in a proper manner, and to "give himself wholly to it," as the great business and pleasure of his life. (P. O. Acts 6:1—7. Note, 1 Tim. 4:11—16.) He who, having this world's goods, was enabled to serve the common cause, and to provide for his needy brethren; let him do it "liberally" without covetousness, and "in simplicity," without ostentation, or assuming authority on that account: but with a single design of glorifying God by doing good to men. He also, who was called to exercise authority, either in the church over any description of its ministers, or in any magistracy or presidency in the community; let him deem himself advanced, not for his own honour, but for the good of others; and let him accordingly employ himself diligently in the performance of his proper duty. And finally, in whatever way any one might be called to exercise compassion, or to alleviate misery; let him do it with cheerfulness, notwithstanding the expense, hardship, danger, or disgusting circumstances, to which it might expose him; counting it his happiness by any means to be useful. (Marg. Ref. q—b.)—I am aware, that these verses are explained by many exclusively of the different orders of church-officers and rulers; and so every man endeavours to find his own system of ecclesiastical polity in them: but, though the various duties of the ministry in all its parts, are principally intended, there is no proof that the apostle meant them exclusively. He seems rather to have inculcated a general improvement of every man's talents, for the common benefit of the church, whatever his gifts and place were. And as there were "saints in Cesar's household" soon after, it is not improbable that Christians might be called to the lower functions of the magistracy. (Notes, 16:21—23. Acts 13:6—12. Phil. 4:21,22.) The epistle, however, was intended, by the Holy Spirit, for the edification of the church in all ages; and it may be supposed, that the duties of Christian magistrates, as well as those of churchrulers, are hinted at in the general language used by the apostle.—Some consider the word, rendered "ministry," (7) to be a general term for the different orders of ministers in the church, which are afterwards enumerated: but the disjunctive particle or, seems unfavourable to that interpretation. The original word may point out the office of the primitive deacons; but the exhortation to "give with simplicity," or liberality, appears more properly addressed to those who distributed their own property, than to the deacons who were intrusted with the treasures of the church; and to whom, faithfulness, prudence, and impartiality, were especially necessary.—Gifts. (6) Many seem to think that spiritual, or miraculous, gifts are exclusively intended by this word: but this is evidently different from the general use of the word; and the office of a minister, of whatever order, is itself a distinct thing from a man's qualifications for it. Other endowments were even at that time necessary to the due performance of the ministerial duties, even more so, than supernatural gifts; and the money, which some distributed, whether their own or the church's, was a talent of entirely another nature: yet all were the free gifts of God, and as such to be received and improved.

V. 9—13. The apostle next exhorted the Christians at Rome, to see to it, that their professed love of each other was sincere, and free from dissimulation and from that unmeaning and deceitful compliment, with which the world abounded, notwithstanding its selfishness.—This hollow show of affection, the counterfeit of genuine love, they ought by all means to avoid: and to be cordial, faithful, liberal, compassionate, forgiving, and kind in their whole temper and conduct. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, Jam. 2:14—18. 1 Pet. 1:22. 3:8—12. 1 John 3:18—24.) Depending on divine grace, they must also learn habitually to detest and dread all kinds of evil; and to love and delight in every thing good, kind, excellent, or useful; and to cleave constantly to it, whatever opposition or temptation they met with. By a holy kind of natural affection for their brethren in Christ, the effect of regeneration and progressive sanctification, they should delight in every exercise of mutual love. In deep humility, and a disposition to animadvert on their own faults, and to notice the gifts and graces of others, they ought to prefer and honour one another; yield that respect and precedency to others which ambitious men claim to themselves; and readily honour, and induce others to honour, the estimable conduct of their brethren, who, on one account or another, were disregarded or discouraged. (Marg. Ref. d —h. Notes, 3—5. 1 Cor. 12:15—26. Phil. 2:1—4.) Whatever business any of them were called to, they ought to avoid slothfulness, and to do it in a skilful, diligent, and assiduous manner, from love to Christ, and zeal for the honour of the gospel, with "fervency of spirit, as serving the Lord" in their most ordinary employments. (Marg. Ref. i—l. Notes, Eph. 6:5—9. Col. 3:22—25.) This would ennoble every business, and render it acceptable to God: and it would redound to the credit of the gospel, if every Christian acquitted himself better in the business which he undertook, than other men did.—They were also called on "to rejoice in hope" of that glorious inheritance, which the promise of God ensured to them: and thus to bear up under their various trials, with submission, constancy, cheerfulness, and meekness. And as they could do none of these things of themselves; they ought to persist in constant earnest prayers, notwithstanding all the discouragements which they would feel, and the temptations with which they would meet, to render them slack in that duty. (Marg. Ref. m—o. Notes, Eph. 6:18—20. Phil. 4:5—7. 1 Thes. 5:16—22.) Not only the wealthy, but all of them according to their ability, ought to distribute to the necessity of their poorer brethren; and hospitably to entertain in their houses such as were driven out by persecution, or came as strangers from other cities, or were in any way destitute; trusting in God to provide for the expense thus incured.—Given to, &c. (13) 'Stay not till occasions of this kind force themselves upon you; and much less till importunity extort the favour, as it were, against your will; but, like Abraham, look out for proper objects of such a bounty, and follow after them to bring them back to your houses.' Doddridge. (*Marg. V. 14—16. With the kindness to friends and brethren above inculcated, Christians must harbour no resentment against their enemies; but pray for their persecutors and all men, in genuine good-will, and never utter bad wishes or imprecations against any one. (Marg. Ref. r. Notes, Matt. 5:43—48. Luke 6:27—36. 1 Thes. 5:12—15. 1 Pet. 3:8—12.) Instead of grudging or envying the prosperity of their brethren or neighbours, they ought benevolently and unfeignedly to rejoice with them in it; as well as to sympathize with those who mourned, and endeavour to relieve and comfort them. (Marg. Ref. s, t. Note, 1 Cor. 13:4—7.) Thus they all ought to be united in one mind and affection, and to judge themselves interested in the welfare of every individual of the body, to which they were joined. (Notes, 3—5. 1 Cor. 12: 15—26.) Nor ought they to covet, value, or aspire to high things, such as wealth, honourable connexions, preferments, reputation; but be satisfied to associate with men of low estate, or to stoop to mean and low accommodations; being contentedly poor, or condescendingly and benevolently rich.

18 If [c]it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men.

19 Dearly beloved, [d]avenge not yourselves, but rather [e]give place unto wrath: for it is written, [f]Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord.

20 Therefore, [g]if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap [h]coals of fire on his head.

(Marg. Ref. u—y.) Especially, they should avoid all conceit of their own wisdom, as if they were above ordinary rules, had no occasion to ask wisdom of God, or to regard the counsel of their brethren; or as if they ought to be at the head of every business; and nothing could be well done if they were not consulted or employed about it. V. 17—21. The preceding exhortations had principally respected the behaviour of Christians one toward another: but these relate to their conduct among their unconverted neighbours. No provocation ought ever to induce any of them to "render evil for evil to any man," however base his character were; whether he were a Jew, Gentile, Greek, barbarian, heretic, or schismatic. In every part of their conduct, and in all their dealings, they ought to devise and endeavour, that uprightness, punctuality, sincerity, and fidelity, might evidently appear in them, in the sight of their most severe judges. (Marg. Ref. a, b. Notes, 2 Cor. 8:16—24. 1 Thes. 5:12—22.) By the most harmless and forbearing conduct, and by every sacrifice and concession, they ought, "if possible," to avoid all quarrels and litigations, and to live at peace among their most unreasonable and injurious neighbours: avoiding all contention, as the greatest evil to their own souls, and to the cause of true religion; except it were a meek, but steadfast, contention for the truth. (Marg. Ref. c. Notes, Eph. 4:1—6. Col. 3:12—15. Heb. 12:14. Jam. 3:17,18. Jude 3,4.) When they were insulted, defrauded, or assaulted, even if no redress could be obtained from the magistrate, they must not on any account presume to avenge themselves; but rather give way to the wrath of their enemies, and without opposition endure the effects of it: or, as some interpret it, they should "give place," and leave it to God, whose wrath they had incurred, to punish them, if he saw good; as private persons must "give place," and leave the punishment of those who had robbed or assaulted them, to the magistrate. (Marg. Ref. d, e. Notes, Matt. 5:38—42. Luke 6:27—36. 9:51—56. 22:47—53. 1 Pet. 2:18—25.) For God had declared that "vengeance belonged to him:" when therefore an unauthorized person presumed to avenge himself, he invaded God's prerogative, and, as it were, attempted to wrest his sword of justice out of his hand. (Marg. Ref. f. Notes, 13:3—5. Num. 31:2. Deut. 32:34,35. Ps. 94:1—7. Prov. 24:17,18,29. Nah. 1:2—6. Luke 18:1—8. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. Heb. 10:28—31. Rev. 6:9—11. 16:3—7. 18:20.)—On the contrary, they ought to wait for the opportunity of their enemy being in distress, in order kindly to supply his wants, and alleviate his sufferings; as a man would feed and give drink to a weary, wounded, fainting traveller. In doing this, they would use the proper method for melting down his obdurate heart into reciprocal affection; like the founder, who not only puts fire under the hard piece of metal, but heaps fire over it also, that by fire on every side it may at length be melted. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Note, Prov. 25:21,22.) In this contest of love against hatred, they should persevere with a fixed determination not to yield, or to be overcome by any degree or number of injuries, or by any ingratitude or ill usage; so as to give way to resentment, or to cease from embracing the opportunity of returning kindness: but with a holy pertinacity to persist in the purpose of "overcoming evil with good," after the example of the Lord towards them. 'He is overcome of evil, who sins in his conduct to another, because the other sinned in his conduct towards him.'—Heap coals, &c. (20) 'I believe the sense is rather this, that if he persevere in his enmity, ... after these kind offices, thou by thy patience shalt engage the wrath of God to fall upon him, and to maintain thy cause against him. ..So Prov. 20:22. "Say not thou, I will recompense evil; but wait on the LORD, and he shall save thee."—This is the import of the phrase in the Old Testament, where only it occurs. (Ps. 140:9,10. ... Is. 47:14. ... Ez. 10:2. 2 Esdras 16:52.)' Whitby.—Those commentators, who argue that this cannot be the meaning, for that would be 'applying to revenge, and building upon it,' while it is expressly forbidden; seem not to have duly adverted to some other parts even of the New Testament. (Luke 18:7,8. 2 Thes. 1:5—9. Rev. 9,10. 16:5—7. 18:20.) To expect that God will avenge himself on those who injure us out of hatred to him, and are not won over by any kindness shown to them, is very different from "avenging ourselves:" and it is evident, from the texts referred to, that in some cases to desire, that God would deliver his servants, by taking vengeance on their persecutors, or to rejoice when this is done, is not an unholy passion. At the same time it is asserting far too much to say, that in all cases, (or in any case, without the special grace of God,) our kindness will melt down our obdurate enemies. On the other hand, Dr. Whitby too readily takes it for granted, that in the passage in Proverbs, which the apostle quotes, "coals of fire" mean the vengeance of God; and one text at least he has overlooked, in which that expression is used of the intense fervour and great strength of love, (Note, Cant. 8:6,7.) while he appears to have misunderstood another. (Note, Prov. 20:22.)—Upon the whole, it appears to me, that both interpretations may stand. The line of our duty is clearly marked out; and if our enemies are not melted down by persevering kindness, they will be consumed by the fiery wrath of "that God to whom vengeance belongeth." This does not, however, at all deduct from the loving and spiritual import of the exhortation: which being found in the Old Testament, and not exceeded even in the New, is a full refutation of the opinion held by very many, that a more spiritual rule of duty is established under the gospel, than had before existed. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. Surely they strangely misunderstand the doctrines which the apostle teaches, who suppose them inconsistent with exhortations, and instruction in all the several duties of Christianity; or as inimical to the practice of them! The same inspired writer who most fully establishes, and most earnestly argues for, the doctrines of grace, is also most exact and particular in exhorting Christians to their various duties. Those who seem afraid that his doctrine may tend to licentiousness, will be equally averse to the impracticable strictness of his precepts: and many who profess to be zealous friends to the former, are apt to find fault with the latter as legal, when echoed by the faithful preachers of the gospel. But the mercies of God, apprehended by faith, and experienced in the heart, and exciting by divine grace reciprocal love and gratitude, form the grand motive to all willing obedience. (Notes, Luke 7:40—50. 2 Cor. 5:13—15. 1 John 4:19.) The love of Christ, abounding in our souls, will cause us earnestly to desire, that our bodies also (the work of his creating power, and the purchase of his redeeming blood,) should be "presented to him as a living sacrifice:" that he may be magnified in and by them, whether by the actions and sufferings of a devoted holy life, or by "laying down our lives for his sake;" which is in every respect our "reasonable service." (Notes, Phil. 1:19—26.) May we then, with a willing mind, bring our bodies to be washed and consecrated to the Lord, as instruments of righteousness unto him!—The transformation of the soul by "the renewing of the Holy Ghost," produces so holy a judgment and taste, and such heavenly affections, that it will readily show us in what respects we must avoid conformity to the world: and it will lead us to an equal distance from useless singularities, and from timid, carnal, and dishonourable compliances. But, if the world possess a large share in the heart, some excuse will be invented for indulging the favourite inclination.—Experience will convince us, and this alone can do it effectually, how good and pleasant "the acceptable and perfect will of the Lord is:" so that the more we refuse conformity to a vain and wicked world, that we may walk with God in his holy ways; the more indifferent we shall grow to the former, and the greater delight we shall take in the latter.—Every avenue of the soul should be guarded against pride: and repeated warnings on this subject are needful to all men, especially to those who are in any respect conspicuous. (Notes, 2 Cor

CHAPTER XIII.

The apostle strongly inculcates subjection to rulers, the payment of tribute, and rendering to all their dues, 1—7. He exhorts to love of each other, as the fulfilment of the second table of the law, 8—10; and in the near prospect of complete salvation, to put away all the works of darkness, and seek in all things to be conformed to the Lord Jesus, 11—14.

LET [a]every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For [b]there is no power but of God: the powers that be, are [c]ordained of God.

2 Whosoever therefore [c]resisteth the power, [d]resisteth the ordinance of God: and they that resist, shall [e]receive to themselves damnation.

3 For [f]rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. [g]Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power? do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same:

a Deut. 17:12. Eph. 5:21. Tit. 3:1. 1 Pet. 2:13—17. 2 Pet. 2:10,11. Jude 8.

.2:7—10. P. O. 1—10.) If indeed we soberly estimated our endowments and compared them with our deserts; if we duly considered from whom, and for what, we have received them, and how far we have come short of a proper improvement of them; they would all conduce to our humiliation, as well as the increase of our gratitude; and thus we might know and improve our talents, and yet be covered with shame for not having better improved them. But we are apt to shine in our own eyes, and "to think of ourselves more highly than we ought to think:" and this leads us to neglect the glory of God, and our duty as "members of the Body of Christ;" and to indulge emulation, ambition, contests for precedency, contempt of others, and discontent with our own proper place and service. Let us then watch and pray against these pernicious evils; and, whatever our gifts or situation may be, let us endeavour to occupy with our talent, humbly, diligently, cheerfully, and in simplicity; not seeking our own credit or profit, but the good of many, both temporal and eternal.

V. 9—16. It is our duty, and should be our constant endeavour, from "undissembled love," to exceed in evident benevolence, kindness, and courteousness, all those appearances, which polite selfishness assumes; and to be really as ready to oblige and be serviceable, as polite wordly people profess to be. Thus "abhorring all evil," "cleaving to all good," and delighting in every exercise of brotherly love; being in our element, when contributing to the comfort of others; and habitually ready "in honour to prefer others to ourselves;" we shall "adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour," and it will appear amiable in the eyes of those with whom we live.—While religion cuts the sinews of that selfish activity, which keeps the world in motion, it supplies its place by still more efficacious principles. (Note, Gal. 2:17—21.) Love to God and man, with zeal for the honour of the gospel, will influence the intelligent Christian to be diligent in his worldly business, and in acquiring superior skill, that in it he may "serve the Lord" with "fervency of spirit." The joyful hope, also, of heavenly felicity will better support him, in his labours and trials, and endue his soul with more patient constancy, than the expectation of worldly riches or distinctions can do their deluded votaries: while, by "instant continuance in prayer," he will find his hope confirmed, and his alacrity in duty revived from time to time. Thus cheerfully dispensing of his gains or earnings, to the necessities of his brethern; "using hospitality without grudging;" blessing and wishing well even to his most injurious and malicious enemies; and feeling no ill-will against any man, but good-will to all; sharing the joy of the prosperous, and sympathizing with the sorrowful; being of one mind and heart with all the children of his heavenly Father; not aspiring to high things in this world, but condescending (if sinful worms can be said to condescend) "to men of low estate," and not thinking any honest employment beneath him, or any provision too mean for him; he may pass safely, comfortably, and usefully through life, and be habitually prepared for a better world.

V. 17—21. Regard to the honour of the gospel, and love to mankind, will dispose the zealous Christian, as far as he can, to "provide things honest," becoming, and creditable in the sight of others; to "live peaceably if possible with all men;" to bear injuries without retaliation or eager resistance, committing his cause to "God to whom vengeance belongeth;" to pity and relieve the miseries of his persecutors or enemies, and to endeavour, by persevering kindness, to convert them into friends: as the love of Christ and his own experience cannot fail to supply motives for persisting in this only contest, and render him ambitious of the most honourable of all victories, even that of "overcoming evil with good."—And what now is this, but a few particulars of the holy law of love, expounded and enforced by evangelical principles? Yet, if our eternal state were to be determined, even as to the most conscientious part of our lives, according to the obedience which we have paid to them, or our failure in them; even Sinai's fire and thunder would not be so tremendous as such a judgment. But if, as redeemed sinners, justified in Christ Jesus, we are called to obey these beautiful precepts by his grace and for the honour of his name, while his blood still cleanses away our daily stains; we then see them to be kind monitors, to show us in what manner we may "prove the sincerity of our love," enjoy the foretastes of heaven, be blessings to all around us, and grow meet for the employment and felicity of angels. And if all, who contend for the doctrines of grace, were thus "a peculiar people zealous of good works," the gospel would appear in its genuine simple beauty, and all would be put to shame who falsely accused our good conversation in Christ.

NOTES.—CHAP. XIII. V. 1, 2. Proceeding more earnestly and affectionately to exhort the Christians at Rome, "by the mercies of God;" (Note, 12:1.) the apostle next called on them "to be subject to the higher powers." The Jews entertained various scruples, on the lawfulness of obeying heathen magistrates; (Note, Matt. 22:15—22.) and this gave occasion to turbulent spirits to excite scandalous and ruinous insurrections: and the same spirit might creep in among Christians, to the great disgrace of the gospel; as in later times, ecclesiastics, especially in the church of Rome, have claimed the most exorbitant exemptions in this particular. The apostle therefore used the most decisive language on this subject: "every soul," or person, whether a Jewish or a Gentile convert, a private Christian or a minister, or however distinguished by miraculous gifts, or by his station in the church, or in any other way, was absolutely required to be subject to the laws and edicts of those who held authority in the state; that is, in all things lawful. (Marg. Ref. a.) The "higher powers" at Rome were not only heathen, but usurping, oppressive, and even persecuting governors; and Nero, who was then emperor, was a monster of cruelty, caprice, and wickedness, almost unparalleled in the annals of mankind: yet no exception was made on that account. Christians were required to look above such concerns; and to consider God as the Source of all authority and civil government as his appointment for the benefit of mankind: the several forms of government, prevailing in different places, were to be regarded as the effect of his superintending providence; and the persons raised to authority as his deputies. (Marg. Ref. b. Notes, Tit. 3:1,2. 1 Pet. 2:13—17.) It was, therefore, incumbent on all Christians to render a prompt and quiet obedience to those governors under whom their lot was cast; patiently submitting to the hardships, and thankfully receiving the benefits thence resulting; without objecting to the vices of the constitution, the administration, or the rulers, as an excuse for refusing subjection.—It is evident that the apostle did not mean to determine the divine right of absolute monarchy, or exclusively of any form of government; but to inculcate subjection to the ruling powers of every place and time, in which believers lived.—The benefits of civil government are very many and great; and it is the appointment of God for maintaining order among the apostate and selfish race of men: so that any man, who should set himself to oppose the established government of that nation in which he lived, would be considered as resisting the providence and rebelling against the authority of God, who gave the rulers their authority, and will himself call them to account for the use which they make of it. (Marg. Ref. c—e.)—'All other governments derived their power from God, as well as that of the Jews; though they had not the whole frame of their government immediately from him, as the Jews had. . . . Whether we take powers here, in the abstract, for political authority, or in the concrete, for the persons actually exercising political power and jurisdiction, the sense will be the same. . . . How men come by rightful title to this power, or who has this title, the apostle is wholly silent, and says nothing of it. To have meddled with that, would have been to decide of civil rights, contrary to the design and business of the gospel, and the example of our Saviour, who refused meddling in such cases, with this decisive question, "Who made me a judge or a divider over you?"' Locke.—The words, rendered "the powers that be," or "the existing authorities," seem expressly intended to exclude all such inquiries. Whatever be the form of the existing government, or the way by which it was established: while it continues to exist, it must be regarded and submitted to, as the appointment of Providence. Perhaps nothing involves greater difficulties, in very many instances, than to ascertain, to whom, either individually, or collectively, the authority justly belongs; or, in fact what constitutes a lawful title to authority. If then the most learned and intelligent men find insuperable difficulties, and differ widely in their opinions respecting this subject; how shall the bulk of the people be able to decide it? And if Christians are first to determine concerning the right, by which their rulers possess and exercise authority, before they think themselves bound to obedience: they must very commonly indeed be engaged in opposition to "the existing authorities." But the apostle's design was to mark out the plain path of duty to Christians, however circumstanced.—'The resistance, which consists in non-subjection, or a refusal to yield actual obedience to the law of the superior, can only be allowed when the matter of the law is sinful, and so forbidden by the higher Power; not when it is judged inexpedient or unprofitable only: for of this, subjects are not to judge, 4 For [b]he is the minister of God to thee for good. But if thou do that which is evil, [c]be afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain; for he is the minister of God, [d]a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil.

5 Wherefore [e]ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath, but also for [m]conscience' sake.

6 For, for this cause [n]pay ye tribute also: for they are God's minister's, [o]attending continually upon this very thing.

7 Render [p]therefore to all their dues: tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom; [q]fear to whom fear; [r]honour to whom honour.

but the lawgiver only; in that they lawfully may, and therefore to avoid scandal and punishment, and from respect to him who is God's vicegerent, ought to obey; even as servants ought to obey their froward masters, and children their parents, in all lawful things, (Col. 3:20. 1 Pet. 2:18.) ... and this from conscience towards God. ... No resistance of the higher powers by force, can be allowed to any who have not the power of the sword. ... For he that thus uses it, takes the sword without authority, from him "to whom belongeth vengeance;" ... and so without authority from Him to whom this power of the sword originally belongs. ... Where a people hath conferred not an absolute power, but a government according to the law, they must be supposed to have reserved to themselves a power necessary to preserve their laws.' Whitby.—Thus in mixed governments, there are legal and constitutional methods, by which the encroachments of one part of the government upon the rights of the others, may be resisted. But Christians, in private stations, have not much concern in this: and complicated cases may possibly arise, in which no previous rules or counsels can give adequate direction. Submission in all things lawful to the "existing authorities," is our duty at all times and in all cases; though in civil convulsions, and amid great revolutions, and sudden changes in governments; there may frequently, for a season, be a difficulty in determining which are to be considered as the "existing authorities."—To claim the protection of the law, against the illegal violence even of magistrates, is not "resisting the powers that be." (Notes, Acts 16:35—40. 22:22—30. 25:9—11.)—The word rendered damnation, properly signifies judgment: and is by many expositors explained exclusively of the punishment inflicted by the magistrate: but the apostle is speaking of our duty to God, in obeying magistrates; which if we neglect, he will call us to account for it, and finally condemn us, except we repent.—Some have urged, against the interpretation here given, that if this be indeed the rule of our religion, it lies open to the charge of abetting tyranny, and being inimical to civil liberty. But I apprehend, that this is not the case: for all the crimes committed by usurpers, tyrants, and oppressors, are at least as severely condemned in Scripture, as those committed by rebels and traitors. Now a religion cannot justly be regarded as abetting tyranny, or as inimical to civil liberty, which denounces the severest vengeance of God on those who act tyrannically, and unjustly deprive men of liberty. The apostle was not writing a treatise on politics; but teaching a company of private Christians their duty. Had he been called on by Nero, or any other oppressive ruler, as he was by Felix, he would doubtless have "reasoned with him on righteousness, temperance, and a judgment to come:" (Note, Acts 24:24—27.) and had he been sent immediately by God to rulers, as the ancient prophets were; he would doubtless have plainly told them their duty, and protested against particular instances of their tyranny and oppression, in the "spirit and power of Elijah," and of John the Baptist, when he said to Herod concerning Herodias, "It is not lawful for thee to have her." (Notes, 1 Kings 21:17—25. Matt. 14:3—5.) But it should be very seriously considered, on the other hand, whether the charge of being seditious, and "hurtful to kings and provinces," has not in every age been brought against the zealous worshippers of God? (Notes, Ezra 4:12—24. Luke 23:1—5. Acts 16:19—24. 17:5—9.) whether this has not been, and is not at this day, the main pretext of persecutors; and of those who would exclude the preachers of the gospel out of their several districts? and whether the necessity, which is laid on Christians "to obey God rather than man," is not in many cases likely enough to exasperate the spirit of haughty princes, without openly avowing that there are other cases in which we are not bound to obey them?—cases, which in fact call their right to authority in question, and directly impeach their wisdom and justice. Surely this is suited to increase that jealousy against the ministers, missionaries, and professors of the gospel, in the minds of rulers, in all parts of the world, which to this day forms one grand barrier to the propagation of Christianity; a barrier, insurmountable except by the power of God. Had the primitive Christians explained the apostle's doctrine, with so many exceptions, and limitations, and cautions, as numbers do at present, and acted accordingly; and had Christianity assumed that political aspect, which it has generally borne in latter ages, (arising from the circumstances of the times;) nothing but a constant succession of miracles could have prevented its extirpation, by the rage of its numerous persecutors. But, in this respect, the apostles, and primitive ministers and Christians, and their successors for some ages, when situated "as lambs amidst wolves," were indeed "wise as serpents and harmless as doves." Yet they did not escape the charge of being seditious: but where do we read of an accusation brought against them as abettors of tyranny and enemies of liberty?

V. 3—5. 'In this way God preserves the good, and restrains the bad: by this sentence, the magistrates themselves are admonished of their duties to their subjects.' Beza.—In the general course of human affairs, rulers are not a terror to honest, quiet, and good subjects, but to depredators and malefactors: and, on the whole, the benefits of government, even when in many instances it is oppressive, far more than counterbalance its evils, and the worst regular government existing on earth is immensely preferable to anarchy. Those, therefore, who would be free from terror in this respect, should lead honest and inoffensive lives; and then they will in ordinary cases be countenanced, protected, and even commended, by their rulers; and may look on them as the ministers of Providence for their good, in defending their persons, property, and habitations, from the violence of wicked men. On the other hand, the evil-doer ought to be afraid: for the magistrate does not "bear the sword" of justice "in vain;" but as the minister of God's providential government of the world, as "a revenger" by his authority to punish those who violate the peace of the community: (Note, 12:17—21.) so that it is absolutely necessary for men to submit to the authority of the magistrate; not only from fear of his wrath, but also "from conscience' sake" towards God. (Marg. Ref.) If the ruler abuse his authority, God will call him to an account for it; there are in many countries legal and constitutional checks upon those who attempt to introduce tyranny: and on great occasions, the people will sometimes, with one consent, arise against a cruel oppressor, and subvert his government; as the Romans did against Nero, who was condemned by the senate to die, as an enemy to mankind, with the approbation of the whole world. But Christians are seldom called on to take any active or leading part in such transactions. If laws be unreasonably formed, or iniquitously executed; this should be endured as a cross laid on them, till they, who are legally authorized, apply a remedy to the evil; or nothing more be attempted than by peacable and respectful petitions. And if we be required by human authority to sin against God, we must steadfastly refuse obedience, and cheerfully and meekly endure the consequence, well satisfied with the blessings ensured by the promise of God, to those "who suffer for righteousness' sake." V. 6, 7. For similar reasons it is the duty of Christians to pay taxes also: because as the advantages of government are great, so must its expenses be very large. Rulers are "the ministers of God," in providence, who are called "to attend constantly to this very thing." It is proper, and for the good of the people, that they, their families, and attendants, should appear in dignity and splendour: they are, and ought to be, taken from the highest ranks in the community: as the temptations of such exalted stations must in general be irresistibly strong, to those who have been educated in comparative indigence. (Notes, Prov. 28:3. 30:21—23. Ec. 10:5—7,16—19.)—Both governors and governed are fallen creatures; and therefore selfishness can by no method whatever be excluded. Some excess of expenditure, some improper accumulation of treasure, some waste of it, in providing for relatives and dependents, may be expected, though not us-tified.—Taxes must therefore be imposed, and ought to be scrupulously paid. (Marg. Ref. n.) Sometimes they will be oppressive, or very heavy; but this grievance should be patiently endured, till it be constitutionally redressed. So that it is the will of God, that his worshippers and servants render to rulers the tribute, custom, excise, or impost, demanded legally from him, with as much exactness, as they would pay any other debt. (Note, Matt. 22:15—22.) They must use no collusion or fraud; they should not hesitate or murmur: and all smuggling, or dealing in contraband goods; all withholding or evading duties imposed on any commodity; and every species of this kind of imposition, is a direct rebellion against the providence and most express commandment of God. And, however it may be palliated or varnished over; it is not merely a defalcation of the revenue, but likewise a robbery of all who pay taxes. For such collusions will not prevent the sum required from being raised upon the public: so that, when one tax falls short another is imposed; and when he, who should pay five pounds, pays but three, his more conscientious neighbour must pay seven instead of five, and is therefore directly robbed of forty shillings. At the same time, all the atrocious crimes of the whole body of smugglers, and others who combine to defraud the revenue in a great variety of ways, are abetted by every one, who puts his hand to such a dishonest business. (Note, Ex. 20:15.) In this case, to declaim about the vices and extravagances of rulers, is to add one sin to another; (Notes, 2 Pet. 2:10,11. Jude 5—10.) these things never were worse than in the days of Nero; they are inseparable from human nature: the great Lawgiver was aware of them, when he gave the commandment; and if no man paid a tax, till the character and administration of all concerned in managing public business, and the disposal of the public money, and the tax itself, met his full approbation; none would ever be paid by the selfish and unreasonable part of the community, and the public exigences could never be answered. This subject is the more enlarged on, because the arguments and examples, of some avaricious professors of the gospel, draw in well-meaning people to wound their consciences and disgrace the cause of religion, by evading or refusing taxes, in a disingenuous and fraudulent manner; which is as contrary to simple truth, as to common honesty.—Moreover, the apostle enjoins on Christians, to render "fear," or reverence and "honour," to those to whom they are due, on account of their authority, rank, or any other civil distinction; neither supposing, that religion requires a stiff and rude singularity, in refusing customary titles or expressions of honour and respect to superiors; (Note, Luke 1:1—4.) nor that it allows that petulance and scurrility, with which many delight to vilify the characters and conduct of their rulers, and those in high stations. Their faults should in general be regarded with candour and silence; (for their situation is conspicuous, and their temptations very great;) and, though the honour due to their rank and authority may consist with disapprobation of their conduct; yet not with reviling and defamation of them. The same authority which commands children to honour their parents, commands subjects to honour their rulers; and they should honour them in the same manner. (*Marg. V. 8—10. It cannot be supposed that the apostle meant to prohibit the contracting of debts, on any account, which is next to impossible to the greatest part of mankind. Christians are indeed under the highest obligations to pay all legal demands, without reluctance or needless delay, and with great punctuality: and they should avoid all superfluous expense, and carefully guard against contracting any debts, which they have not a reasonable prospect of discharging. They ought also to stand aloof from all adventurous speculations, or rash engagements as sureties for others, beyond their circumstances; and whatever may needlessly involve them in debts, and expose them to the danger and discredit of not "rendering to all their dues." (Marg. Ref. s. Notes, Ex. 20:15 Prov. 6:1—5.) Yet, when all such demands are answered, and all these rules observed; they still "owe love" to all men, with the various duties which result from its enlarged exercise.—The learned Erasmus long since remarked, that the first clause might as properly and literally be rendered, "Ye do owe no man any thing, but to love one another:" and though subsequent commentators, almost without exception, take the words imperatively; yet it may be worthy of consideration, whether the indicative construction do not, far more simply and evidently, accord to the context. The apostle was exhorting Christians to render to all their dues; (7) and having branched out the general precept into a few particulars; he closes by adding, "Ye owe no man any thing," &c. as if he had said, 'All that I would inculcate is reducible to this; Obey the law of love to others, in all its branches, and then you will render to all their dues.' (Notes, Ex. 20:12—17.) The sense in this construction is obvious and important: but the ordinary interpretation, seeming at least to forbid Christians to contract any debts; and to condemn such as cannot at present discharge those already contracted, may embarrass the minds of the most upright; it requires considerable management in expounding it, so as to prevent this embarrassment: and after all, in the literal import, scarcely any so much as attempt to obey it; indeed to numbers it is, strictly speaking, impracticable. The usual exposition of the next clause, "but to love one another;" 'Be not a debtor to any man of aught but love and affection, which ye ought so to pay, as that ye should have more to pay;' Bp. Hall; is not, to me at least, satisfactory: for why should we be allowed so to come short, in rendering "love to whom love is due;" as to be always there in arrears, and there only? If we daily rendered all that love to our neighbour, which is due to him, we should not remain in his debt. The next day would indeed require a fresh payment, but there would be no arrears due. Upon the whole, therefore, I cannot but decidedly prefer the indicative construction; "Ye do owe," &c. In short, the whole of what the apostle would inculcate was "love" in its various exercises and effects: so that he who loved another, "actually fulfilled the law," in respect of its requirements towards his neighbour; and this "love of our neighbour as ourselves," in obedience to the command of God, would also be the best evidence of our loving him with all our hearts, according to the first and great commandment of the law. (Marg. Ref. u, x. Notes, Ex. 20:1—11. Lev. 19:18. Deut. 6:5. Matt. 19:16—22. Mark 12:28—34. Luke 10:25—37.)—The apostle, by thus appealing to the moral law as the standard of duty, after having so fully shown that no man can be justified by it, completely establishes the distinction between the law as a covenant, and the law as a rule; and proves that our deliverance from it in the former sense, is in order that we might obey it in the latter.—'Not that the law is exactly fulfilled by doing no evil to our neighbour: but, because, in Christ's interpretation, the neglect of doing any good we are able, and have opportunity to do for him, is doing evil. (Mark 3:4.) ... For "charity is also kind," (1 Cor. 13:4.) and engageth us "by love to serve one another." (Gal. 5:13—15.)' Whitby. (Notes, 1:13—16. 1 Cor. 13:4—7. Gal. 6:1—5. 1 John 3:16,17.) Perfect love, with all its effects, fulfils the command of "loving our neighbour as ourselves:" but imperfect love, for a part of our lives, falls very short of this.

V. 11—14. Some think that the apostle here refers to the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, and the more complete establishment of Christianity which followed; but the ruin of the Jewish nation could not much affect the Christians at Rome: and the situation of believers in this life, as expecting complete and eternal salvation, is evidently intended. It behooved them to consider how long they had heard and professed the gospel; and the shortness of the time, that might yet remain to them, in which to glorify God among men. (Marg. Ref. a—c. Notes, Ec. 9:10. Eph. 5:15—20. P. O. John 9:1—12.) Thus they would perceive, that it was full time for them to shake off all remaining sloth and supineness, and to attend to every duty with increasing zeal and vigour; as the day of final salvation approached continually, and was then actually much nearer than when they had first believed in Christ; and consequently their term of remaining usefulness on earth was proportionably abridged.—The redemption by which salvation comes to sinners, was finished with the humiliation of the Saviour, and when he expired on the cross. (Note, John 19:28—30.) Salvation becomes ours, and is begun, when we come to him by faith: it will be finished as to the soul at the hour of death, and as to the body at the day of judgment; when sin and all its consequences will finally be abolished; and "death be swallowed up in victory." (Notes, 1 Cor. 15:50—58.) The life of faith might be called "day," in comparison of the darkness of the idolatrous and unconverted state: yet it was but "night," or twilight, in comparison of the light of heaven. (Notes, 1 Cor. 13:8—12. Eph. 5:8—14. Col. 1:9—14, v. 12.) But this "night was far spent," that "day was at hand:" it was therefore incumbent on them to prepare for it, and anticipate it, by casting off their former sins, in which they had lived during their heathen darkness: as a man would cast off filthy and ragged garments; or as he would put off his night-clothes, before he went out of his chamber. (Notes, Eph. 4:20—24. Col. 3:7—11. Jam. 1:19—21. 1 Pet. 2:1—3.) And they ought to put on not only the garments worn in the day, but their "armour" also; by cultivating and praying for all those holy dispositions which arm the soul to repel temptation, and are at the same time its ornament and beautiful attire: even as the burnished armour is deemed the conqueror's most honourable decoration. (Marg. Ref. d—g. Notes, Is. 59:16—19. 2 Cor. 10:1—6. Eph. 6:14—20. 1 Thes. 5:4—11.) The apostle, therefore, exhorted the Romans, to join with him in walking after a becoming and consistent manner, as those who enjoyed the light of the word of God, and the hope of heaven; keeping at a distance from all excess or intemperance, and sensual or jovial festivity; from all sloth; from every approach to unchastity, and every wanton look, word, or action; and from all contention, fierce zeal, envy, and malevolence. (Marg. Ref. h—m.)—And then, instead of multiplying exhortations, he called upon them "to put on the Lord Jesus," and thus do the whole at once. Let the mind and example of Christ be reflected in all their tempers and conduct; that all, who saw their piety, purity, zeal, benevolence, and self-denial, might recognize the image and character of Christ in them. That, as they stood justified before God in the robe of his righteousness imputed to them; so they might appear before men adorned with his image for sanctification. (Notes, Gal. 3:26—29.) Then they would not contrive means, or seek for opportunities, of gratifying any of their carnal inclinations, nor would they be anxious to provide for the indulgence of their appetites; but they would seek and find satisfaction in such things, as pertained to the life of their souls. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. The grace of the gospel directs our thoughts to the providence of God, as well as to his promises and commandments: and thus it induces submission and cheerful composure; where pride and the carnal mind see nothing but cause for murmurs and disquietude.—Christians should always remember, that there is "no power, but what is" derived from God; "that the powers that be, are ordained of God," though perhaps not according to what we might think the most eligible plan: indeed he often scourges guilty nations by delivering them into the hands of oppressive rulers. "Every soul" however is bound to "be subject to the higher powers:" that while so many, disdaining every yoke, "are not afraid to speak evil of dignities," and want to level all other distinctions, in order that themselves may rise to distinction, by "resisting the power and despising the ordinance of God;" there may be also a protest in the land, against turbulent innovators, entered into by a great multitude, "who fear God, honour the king, and meddle not with those that are given to change." (Note, Prov. 24:21,22.)—Indeed it is far more agreeable to the pride of man, to rise to reputation, by declaiming against kings and princes; than to be employed in humbling ourselves before God for his own sins, and in diligently mortifying our own corrupt inclinations. But surely, there can be no sufficient reason, why ministers of the gospel, and private Christians, should leave their peaceful duties, and bring the truth into disgrace, by becoming volunteers in such services, as apostles, evangelists, and martyrs, never intermeddled with! In our happy land, however, the advantages derived from civil government are immense; our grievances comparatively minute, and often imaginary; and rather the fault of human nature, than of our constitution, or public administration. For speculators on this subject, (even such as profess to believe the doctrine of man's entire depravity,) almost universally blame this or the other form of government, for those evils which in fact are inseparable from fallen nature; and they expect that benefit from the change of forms or persons, which can only be produced by the renovation of men's hearts to the holy image of God; and the mortification of that inordinate self-love, and idolatrous love of the world, which are universal to mankind. (Note, Is. 32:15. P. O. 9—20.) Let then Christians recollect, that "the world lieth in wickedness," and that they are "strangers and pilgrims" in it; that their time here is short; that it is their wisdom and duty to make the best of things as they find them; that submission to the providence and command of God requires their peaceable subjection to governors; and that in refusing this subjection, they rebel against God, and must give an account to him of it. In general our rulers are, what all rulers ought to be, "a terror to evil-doers, and not to those who do well;" as the honest and conscientious have nothing to fear from them, but enjoy great security and religious toleration, in what manner soever they choose to worship God; and as, with few, if any exceptions, none are made afraid, but those who ought to fear; even they whom the magistrate, as "the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon evil-doers," must punish, unless he would "bear the sword in vain." So that in every way it is incumbent on us "to be subject, not only for wrath, but also for conscience' sake."—At the same time magistrates may hence learn, from whom, and for what, they have their power, and what account they must render of it; that they too may attend to their duty in the fear of God, with "whom there is no respect of persons:" remembering the solemn and strict account which they must render to God, of their important talents, when it shall be said unto them, "Give an account of thy stewardship, for thou mayest no longer be steward."—It is also incumbent upon Christians to be exact and exemplary in paying tribute and custom; considering their rulers as "the ministers of God for their good," and receding from their personal interests for the public advantage. They should therefore avoid all appearance of those covetous and fraudulent practices, by which so many plunder their fellow-citizens, in withholding their share of the public revenue. And they ought also to refrain from contumelious and disrespectful language, concerning their governors, and set an example of "rendering fear to whom fear, and honour to whom honour is due." Let then those, who eagerly declaim concerning liberty, without distinguishing it from licentiousness, seriously ask themselves, whether their reasoning can be made consistent with such Scriptures as these? Whether Christ, his apostles, or his primitive disciples, ever spent their zeal about such topics? And whether such declamations and frequent invectives against those, whom the Scripture commands us to honour and obey, can be for the credit of the gospel, and the benefit of true religion?—As to the efforts, which are any where made by those, on whom such trusts constitutionally devolve, to preserve, increase, or assist, the real liberty of mankind, personal, civil, or religious; or to check the career of despotism or oppression, over men of any climate, complexion, or religion; let us zealously forward them with our prayers, and by every means consistent with the peace and good order of the community: and if we would enjoy the blessing of good government, we should pray earnestly and constantly for our rulers, and all in authority; else we have no just cause to complain of any real or supposed grievances, to which we may be subjected by them. (Notes, 1 Tim. 2:1,2.)

V. 8—14. While we rejoice at deliverance from the condemnation of the holy law of God, may its precepts be written in our hearts, and transcribed into our lives, that prudence, honesty, and punctuality may mark all our transactions, and regulate all our expenses, and the payment of our debts, and make way for liberal kindness to the poor. May we learn to "love all men as ourselves;" and then we shall not only avoid gross injuries to their persons, connexions, property, or characters; but we shall do no kind or degree of "evil to any man," but shall study to be useful and beneficial in every relation and station of life.—The longer we have heard and professed the gospel, the more should we deem ourselves bound to shake of all sloth: and the nearer our salvation approaches, the more diligent should we be to finish the work of life, and to go forth to meet our Lord: exulting in the prospect of having speedily done with sin and conflict; and being admitted into the presence of God our Saviour, "where is fulness of joy, and pleasures at his right hand for evermore:" saying with dying Jacob, "I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord."—Emerging from the night of unconversion, and the twilight of our first glimmering views of heavenly things, and looking forward to the day of perfect knowledge and purity; (Notes, Prov. 4:18,19. Hos. 7:1—9 NOTES.—CHAP. XIV. V. 1. Notwithstanding the authority vested by Christ in his apostles, and their infallibility in delivering his doctrine to mankind: differences of opinion prevailed even among real Christians: nor did St. Paul, by an express decision and command, attempt to put a final termination to them. (Notes, 2—6,14—18.) A proposition indeed may be certain and important truth; yet a man cannot profitably receive it without due preparation of mind and heart. Indeed he must himself perceive the nature, evidence, and excellency of the doctrine, and the grounds on which it rests, before he can make any good use of it: so that a compelled assent to any doctrine, or conformity to any outward observances, without conviction, would in general be hypocrisy, and entirely unavailing. So essential are the rights and existence of private judgment, in all possible cases, to the exercise of true religion! and so useless an incumbrance would an infallible judge be, for deciding controversies, and producing unanimity among Christians! (Note, 2 Pet. 1:20,21.)—The apostle had sufficiently declared his mind respecting the ritual law of Moses: and where attention to it was like'y to interfere with the simplicity of men's dependence on Christ, he zealously contended against it. (Notes, 4: 9:30—33. 10:1—4. Gal. 5:1—6.) If the method of subsequent ages had been then in use, the persons here spoken of would have been excluded from the church, and anathematized as obstinate heretics; or driven for relief to their consciences, to separate from those who imposed on them what they counted sinful: and afterwards they would have been shunned and stigmatized as schismatics. But St. Paul, in all the plenitude of his apostolical authority, could endure his fellow-Christians to differ from him in opinion, as to matters of inferior consequence: and, instead of peremptory injunctions, he gave a general rule of the greatest importance, for our conduct in all similar cases. He exhorted the pastors and members of the church at Rome, to receive among them, as a brother, the weak believer; and not to perplex him with disputations about such things, as might appear doubtful to conscientious persons; but to leave him, under the general use of means, and loving instructions, to grow stronger in faith and riper in judgment, by the inward teaching of the Holy Spirit. This general rule applies to many particulars, both respecting doctrine, worship and practice. If a man do not profess repentance, and a believing dependence, as a justly condemned sinner, on the righteousness and atonement of Christ, "Emmanuel," "God manifest in the flesh," and a reliance on the Holy Spirit for teaching and sanctification; it does not appear, that he can properly be regarded as a believer, or admitted into the communion of the saints. (Note, 2 John 7—11.) But when these things are professed in words, and not denied in works, a man ought at least to be received as one, who is "weak in the faith;" and more established believers should meekly help him forward, though he may yet be under the power of many prejudices and mistakes. (Note, 15:1—3.)—'The force of the apostle's admirable reasoning in favour of candour and mutual condescension, cannot be enervated by saying, as some have unhappily done, ... that there was no separation between Jewish and Gentile Christians.—Had the things judged indifferent by the latter, and apprehended sinful by the former, been imposed; a separation of communion would have ensued, and the schism, on the apostle's principles, would have been chargeable on the imposers. When it shall please God to awaken in the governors of established protestant churches such a spirit of moderation and goodness, joined with a true zeal for religion; as to leave such things in that natural state of indifference, in which almost all sensible men confess it best they should be left, many separations will cease of course.' Doddridge.—Thus the guilt of schism is reciprocally charged, by all parties, on their opponents; and indeed truly, when it is not done exclusively; or so as to suppose that all the fault lies on one side. For the same state of mind and heart generally prevails, in those who impose unscriptural terms of communion: and in those who separate themselves from their brethren, without sufficient reason; and then endeavour to make the cause of their separation appear as cogent as they can, in order to justify themselves. So that, not only the 'governors of protestant established churches,' but the leading men among dissenters, and seceders also, need to be brought, by the illumination and grace of the Holy Spirit, to a fuller knowledge of the Scriptures, and more entire conformity to the temper there inculcated. In proportion as men approach nearer and nearer, in judgment and disposition, to the word of God, they will be brought nearer to each other; as the lines, from the circumference of a circle, approximate to each other, and to the centre, proportionably. Then each person concerned, (instead of decidedly justifying every particular among those with whom he is connected, and disputing against every thing in use, among such as he differs from,) will seriously compare all particulars, on every side, with the sacred oracles; and in consequence will discover, that neither party is entirely right, and neither entirely wrong. And this conviction, avowed and reduced to practice by the leading men, would gradually be communicated to the rest of the body: and would make way for such amendments, retrenchments, and concessions, on all sides, and such fairness, gentleness, and candour, in debating on the controverted subjects, as would in process of time effectually terminate our unhappy divisions. But "until the Spirit be poured upon us from on high," it cannot be expected that these events will generally take place. It is, however, highly important, that individuals should well consider, from what source contentions in the church, as well as "wars and fightings in the world," actually arise: and what is indispensably necessary, in order to terminate them. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Eph. 4:1—6. Phil. 1:27—30. 2:1—4. Jam. 1:19—21. 3:13—18. 4:1—3. *P. Erasmus renders it, "not to the determinations of disputes." ... Yet indeed the weak should be received, in order to the determination of disputes; that is, that at length, by knowing the truth, he may become stronger: but the apostle orders this to be done, very gradually, that there may be no contention, or vain and unseasonable disputation. ... He teaches, that they should be instructed with mildness and lenity; and so, that in those things,' (of which he is speaking,) 'we ought to accommodate ourselves to their ignorance, from regard to the law of charity.' Beza.

V. 2—4. The apostle next proceeded to exemplify his general rule, by a particular instance. One Christian, either a Gentile convert, or a Jew who had been set free from the prejudices of his nation, believed it lawful to eat any kind of meat, without regarding the distinctions of the law in that respect: another, either a Jewish convert, or one who had imbibed Jewish prejudices, would eat only vegetables, (especially when in company with Gentile converts,) lest he should unawares eat some unclean thing. This indeed showed, that he was weak and unestablished in the faith and in religious knowledge; yet it evinced him to be conscientious. (Marg. Ref. d—f. Notes, Dan. 1:8—16. Acts 10:9—16. 1 Cor. 10:23—28.) Here then mutual candour ought to be exercised: the Christian, who knew and used his liberty, must not despise his weak brother, as ignorant or superstitious; and so disdain to associate with him, or use contemptuous language respecting him. On the other hand, the scrupulous believer must by no means condemn his brother, as self-indulgent or lax in his conduct; or shun him, and speak censoriously of him on that account. For God had accepted him, and taken him into his family, without regarding these distinctions; and it did not behoove any one to "judge" and condemn "another man's servant," for those things against which his own master did not object. The professed Christian was only accountable to his own Lord, who would justify or condemn him, uphold him or leave him to fall, as he saw his real character to be: and, if indeed he was a believer, the

V. 5, 6. The case was similar as to the observance of days. Some Christians considered the Jewish sabbaths, new moons, and other solemnities to be still in force, and so required by the law of God, and accordingly they regarded them in a religious manner: others were satisfied, that the ritual law was abrogated, and that these appointments were no longer obligatory, so that in this respect they regarded every day alike: for we cannot suppose that they did not observe the Lord's day, or any days of fasting and prayer, or thanksgiving. (Notes, Gal. 4:8—11. Col. 2:16,17.) In such matters, it was chiefly necessary that every man should be fully satisfied in his own mind, as to his duty, and that he acted from proper motives in it. If then a Christian "regarded a day" according to the law of Moses, or conscientiously set it apart for devotion; he might be supposed to do it from reverence to the authority of God. And if another Christian, deeming these distinctions to be superseded, omitted all regard to those days, which the other accounted holy; it should be supposed, that he did it with a view to the honour of Christ, of his legislative authority, and his fulfilment of all the ancient typical observances. In like manner, the believer, who ate any kind of food, should be considered as regarding the will and glory of the Lord in it; while he returned thanks both for his food, and for his Christian liberty: on the other hand, he that refrained from this or the other meat, being contented with what he did eat, and thankful for it, should be considered as doing it from a self-denying and conscientious regard to the will of the Lord, even though his scruples were judged to be groundless. (Notes, 1 Cor. 10:23—33.)—Fully persuaded in his own mind. (5) "'Let every man freely enjoy his own sentiment;" and go on in his own way without impediment or censure.' Doddridge. This interpretation is very ancient; but it does not seem to be the most natural construction of the clause.—'Let a man have that persuasion of the lawfulness of what he doeth, or abstains from, as will preserve him from sinning against conscience in it. . . . Let him not search into the judgments and actions of other men, about these matters, to condemn them for them.' Whitby.—'I do not agree with those, who think that the apostle meant nothing more, than that each person should be careful not to do any thing with a doubting or hesitating conscience. For it is not enough, that our conscience consents to what we do; but it is necessary, in the first place, that our conscience be certified from the word of God.' Beza. (*Marg. V. 7—9. It ought to be established as an acknowledged principle, that no real Christian allows his own humour, indulgence, interest, credit, or ease, to be the end for which he lives or acts, as to the general tenor of his conduct; nor does he even avoid, desire, or meet death from selfish motives: but whether his life be prolonged, he aims to spend it to the glory of Christ; or whether death be expected, he refers it to him, to be ordered in all respects for the glory of his own name. So that whether the Christian lives or dies, he belongs to the Lord, to be disposed of as he pleases; and as the object of his love, to be taken care of by him in all possible events. (Marg. Ref. q—s.) For to this very end, Christ both died on the cross, and rose again, and liveth in heaven to die no more; that in human nature he might be the sovereign Lord of all his people, both during their lives and after their death, as they willingly devote themselves to him, and are prompt to labour, suffer, or die for his sake; as he orders all things respecting the time and circumstances of their death, for his own glory and their good; and as, when they die, they are taken to be with him for ever, and he will raise their bodies to share the same felicity. (Notes, 1 Cor. 6:18—20. Phil. 1:19—26.) —Christ is also the Lord of all the dead, and of the living who do not believe in him: he spares their lives, or cuts them off by death, and executes vengeance upon them as he sees good; yet the former sense seems to have been principally intended. (Marg. Ref. t, u. Notes, Matt. 28:18. Acts 10:36—43. Eph. 1:15—23. Rev. 1:12—20.) It is worthy of observation, that the apostle most cogently showed professed Christians, what they ought to be and do, by stating the character and aims of true believers, and by teaching them what charity would suppose, concerning their brethren who differed from them, if their conduct were in other respects consistent with their profession.—"The Lord," evidently means Jesus Christ in these verses; which contain a very conclusive argument in proof of his Deity, and the next verses undeniably confirm it: for to what mere creature can we be thus entirely devoted, without manifest idolatry, and evidently giving to another that supreme affection, which God himself demands? V. 10—12. This suggested another reason why Christians should not "judge" or "despise" one another: as they must all stand in judgment before Christ, when it would be fully made known from what motives every man had acted. (Marg. Ref. y. Notes, 1 Cor. 4:3—5. 2 Cor. 5:9—12. Rev. 20:11—15.)—The prophecy referred to has been before explained of Christ, as "JEHOVAH, our Righteousness." (Marg. Ref. z—c. Notes, Is. 45:23—25. Phil. 2:9—11.)—The apostle's transition from "the judgment-seat of Christ," to "giving an account of ourselves to God," shows how familiar it was to him, to understand the predictions uttered by JEHOVAH, as the words of his divine Lord and Saviour.—Shall confess to God. (11) 'That is, shall adore and acknowledge me as God.' Beza. (Note, 10:5—11.)—'If these words, which the prophet certainly spake of JEHOVAH, . . . be well applied by the apostle to Christ; Christ must also be the Person intended by them: for how could the apostle prove, that "every knee must bow" to Christ from the words of God, "to me every knee shall bow;" if Christ were, in his whole nature and essence, as different from that God who spake those words of himself, as is a creature from his great Creator?' Whitby.—As I live, &c. V. 13—18. (Notes, 2:1—3. Matt. 7:1—5. Jam. 4:11,12.) The apostle concludes this part of his subject, by exhorting Christians not to judge, censure, or condemn one another, any more; especially the Jewish converts should not judge their Gentile brethren: and he then enters on another exhortation in which the Gentile converts were principally concerned. This he introduces by using the same word, in somewhat a

17 For [q]the kingdom of God [r]is not meat and drink; [s]but righteousness, [t]and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.

18 For he that [u]in these things serveth Christ, [v]is acceptable to God, [x]and approved of men.

19 Let us therefore [y]follow after the things which make for peace, [z]and things wherewith one may edify another.

20 [a]For meat destroy not [b]the work of God. [c]All things indeed are pure; [d]but it is evil for that man who eateth with offence.

21 It is [e]good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor any thing [f]whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak.

22 Hast [g]thou faith? have it to thyself before God. [h]Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth.

23 And [i]he that [j]doubteth is [k]damned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith: [l]for whatsoever is not of faith is sin.

different sense. Instead of exercising their judgment about others, let them learn to act judiciously in their own conduct, that they might not ensnare their brethren, or occasion them to sin: as if a man should heedlessly lay a stone, or a trap, in another's way, which might occasion his falling, or being hurt. This they would be apt to do, by an inexpedient use of lawful things. The apostle assuredly knew, by the revelation of Christ, that no kind of food was any longer polluted in itself: yet if a man supposed the ceremonial distinctions to be still in force, the meat which he ate, contrary to his judgment and conscience, would be unclean to him; and he therefore ought to abstain, till more fully satisfied. (Marg. Ref. h—k. Notes, Acts 10:9—16. 1 Cor. 8:7—13. 1 Tim. 4:1—5.) Now, if a stronger and better informed believer induced his weaker brother by his example and influence to eat such things as his conscience protested against, and so to bring guilt and distress upon himself; it was obvious that he did not "walk charitably," loving his brother as himself. For his conduct directly tended to the ruin of one, for whom Christ died; seeing it tempted him to sin, which naturally leads to condemnation. (Marg. Ref. l—n. Note, Jam. 1:13—15.) This does not imply that the weak brother would actually perish: but the contrast is made between the love of Christ to the weak believer who shed his blood to save him; and the want of love in his stronger brother, who would not abridge himself of his indulgent meal, from regard to his welfare; but would rather prove an occasion of sin to him, and so hazard the loss of his soul, than restrain himself in the exercise of his Christian liberty!—Yet, had the apostles written in that exact systematical style, which some affect and require; they would scrupulously have avoided such language. (Note, 2 Pet. 2:1—3.) Christians ought then to be very careful not to use their liberty, which was good and valuable in itself, in so unguarded a manner, or with such bad effects, as might give occasion to its "being evil spoken of:" for the privileges of the kingdom of God, no more consisted in meats and drinks, than its requirements did: so that a believer, who would use his liberty, at any rate and at all events, laid as undue a stress on the indulgence of the new dispensation, as a Jewish convert did on the ceremonial distinctions of the old one. To stand justified before God, to be at peace with him, to possess peace in the heart and conscience, and to experience that pure joy which the Holy Spirit communicates, are the great privileges of the kingdom of God: (Notes, Matt. 3:2. 6:33,34.) and to walk by faith before him as a reconciled Father, in righteousness, and in cheerful holy obedience, according to the grand requirements of the moral law, by "the sanctification of the Spirit," is the substance of the duties of the kingdom: and he, who in such things serves and obeys Christ, is "acceptable to God," and is approved before men to be a true believer; and should therefore be received as such by his brethren, without respect to difference of opinion or practice in more doubtful matters. (Marg. Ref. p, q. Note, 1.)—To infer from hence, as some have incautiously done, that a peaceable exemplary Christian, who is not too rigid in his sentiments, or tinctured with bigotry, will generally be esteemed and loved by mankind; would imply a censure on Paul, on the other apostles, on the prophets, on the most eminent believers in every age, nay, on Christ himself, as if they had not been so candid and liberal as we ought to be: for we know what favour the world showed them. But in fact the men of the church, and not those of the world, are exclusively meant.—'It evidences a cruel mind, to make greater account of food than of a brother's salvation; which they do, who can endure to eat, when it causes a brother to offend, and so gives him occasion of turning aside from the gospel. ... We ought to copy the example of Christ, who, so far from destroying the weak for food, poured out his life for them.' Beza. (Notes, Eph. 5:1,2. Phil. 2:5—8. 1 John 3:16,17.)—Grieved. (15) 'The grief is that which arises from the consciousness of having acted amiss in conformity to the example of a superior.' Doddridge.

V. 19—23. The apostle proceeded to inculcate an assiduous and persevering attention to the interests of peace among Christians; and to all those things by which mutual edification might be promoted. (Notes, Heb. 12:14. Jam. 3:13—18.) Let then none of those, who understood their Christian liberty, allow their own indulgence in food to counteract "the work of God," in the conversion of the Jews, the success of the gospel, or the sanctification of believers; or to destroy any of his rational creatures. Indeed the apostle would have it known, as his decided judgment, (though he had been educated a Pharisee,) that all kinds of meats were alike pure in themselves: yet it would be evil for a man to eat them, when it had a direct tendency to seduce a weak brother into sin. (Marg. Ref. y—d. Notes, 13—18. 1 Tim. 4:1—5.) Nay, so much ought love to preponderate over all considerations of this kind, that it would be "good" and right, for a man to abstain wholly from flesh and wine, and every other indulgence, by which his brother might be tempted to sin, disquieted in his conscience, or weakened in his hope and the vigour of his obedience. (Marg. Ref. e—g. Notes, 1 Cor. 8:7—13. 9:13—23. 10:23—31.) So that those who had stronger faith, and assuredly believed they might lawfully eat any kind of food, should not make ostentation of it, or improperly seize on every occasion of acting according to it: but rather possess it as in the sight of God, who would know their uprightness, when others judged them on that account. Thus they ought to use their liberty with humility, caution, prudence, and self-denial: and without seeming to prefer themselves, or to despise their weaker brethren: and he would be a happy man, who was free from all doubt or self-condemnation, in those things which he allowed himself to do. But if any one doubted whether this or the other indulgence were lawful or not; and yet example, persuasion, or inclination prevailed with him to venture upon it; he would certainly commit a sin, for which his conscience would condemn him, and for which God would condemn him, if he did not repent of it. For, as he did it not "of faith," as he was not fully persuaded in his own mind, that he was allowed by the Scripture to do it; he would be guilty of preferring his own inclination to the dictates of his conscience and the will of God, as he at the time supposed it to be.—In general, every action must be sinful, which is not done "of faith," as satisfied by our views of the word of truth, that we are acting according to the command or by the allowance of God, and may therefore consider ourselves to be in the way of his promised blessing. (Marg. Ref. g—i. Note, Col. 3:16,17.)—It is obvious how groundless the scruples of some serious persons from this text, concerning the Lord's supper, must be: for the apostle's argument is about a subject entirely of another nature.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4. It is of great importance for us to distinguish

CHAPTER XV.

In condescension to the weak, the strong ought to give up their own inclination, for the good of others, after the example of Christ, 1—3. All Scriptures were written for our instruction, 4. The apostle prays for love and harmony among believers, in the worship of God, 5—7; shows that the Scriptures foretell the union of Jews and Gentiles in the service of God; and subjoins a fervent prayer, 8—13. He exhorts the Christians at Rome, as the apostle of the Gentiles, 14—16; and states his extensive labours and usefulness, 17—21. He avows his purpose of visiting Rome, in his way to Spain; desires their prayers in respect to his previous journey to Jerusalem, with the contributions of the Gentile converts, 22—32; and again prays for them, 33.

WE then that are [a]strong [b]ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to [c]please ourselves.

2 Let every one of us [d]please his neighbour for his good to edification.

3 For even [e]Christ pleased not himself: but, as it is written, [f]The reproaches of them that reproached thee fell on me.

4 For [g]whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning; [h]that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope.

5 Now [i]the God of patience [k]and consolation [l]grant you to be like-minded one toward another [m]according to Christ Jesus:

between those who are "weak in faith," and such as are strangers or enemies to the faith: for we ought to receive and affectionately to cherish the former, but to beware of the latter and withdraw from them. It is, however, very difficult for us to bear properly with the mistakes, infirmities, and prejudices of our brethren; or to make due allowances for the weakness of natural capacity, the bias of bad education, or the effects of a partial and erroneous instruction, under their first religious impressions. We are all prone to make our own views the standard of truth, to deem things certain, which to others appear doubtful; to expect, by eager disputation, to bring men to see with our eyes: to perplex new converts with topics which they cannot as yet understand; and to expect them at once to acquiesce in all those truths, which we have been learning for years. (Notes, Mark 4:33,34. John 16:12,13. 1 Cor. 3:1—3. Heb. 5:11—14.) So that, it is almost impracticable to prevail with those, to receive and hold communion with each other, who have been received by the Lord and enjoy communion with him! Thus some have been expelled by their brethren, or have separated from them: and contests or schisms have disgraced the church, grieved her best friends, and rejoiced her enemies: thus Christians have despised or condemned each other, about doubtful or unimportant matters, as if the very essence of faith and piety had been concerned! The distinctions between meats and days were at least as important as many things which are now controverted among us; and it was far more certain on which side the truth was found. Yet men might be real Christians, who could not receive even the apostle's determination on the controversy. Surely then we should enlarge our candour, beyond those narrow limits which many would assign to it. And if we could demonstrate every tittle of our doctrine, and every part of our worship, to be scriptural; yet we ought not to despise or condemn a man, because he is not able to see the conclusiveness of our arguments: and if we must assume it as undeniable, that he is just as far mistaken as he differs from us; we should at least treat him with that tenderness, which we show to one who wants an eye, a leg, or an arm. All who love the gospel ought to shun such persons as excite divisions among those, who appear to love Christ and hate sin: and such shibboleths, as tend to multiply, to perpetuate, or to exasperate them. (Note, Judg. 12:1—7. P. O.) Let us then cease to despise or judge one another, especially about things which are not essential to salvation; let us beware, that we do not attempt to reject, or to cast down, those whom God has received and will uphold; or to judge and condemn his conscientious servants.

V. 5—12. It behooves us, to remember our own unworthiness and proneness to err, and liability to be deceived through inattention, ignorance, prejudices, and corrupt passions, and the numerous instances, in which we have been entirely mistaken, when confident that we were in the right: and, endeavouring to be "fully persuaded" in our own minds about our conduct, as regulated according to the holy Scriptures; let us leave others to the judgment of God. Thus, if some deem it expedient to observe a day, in commemoration of any of those great events which relate to our salvation, let them spend it in a holy manner to the glory of God: and if others judge it best not to observe such days, let them act with humble simplicity, in dissenting from the opinion and practice of their brethren. Then all may be done in a quiet, peaceable, thankful, and Christian manner; as it becomes those who profess neither to "to live nor to die to themselves, but to him who died for them and rose again;" and "ever liveth to be the Lord both of the dead and of the living." Instead of censuring, reviling, deriding, or despising one another; let us all daily and diligently prepare to appear before the judgment-seat of Christ; as he has sworn, that "every knee shall bow and every tongue shall confess to him." (Notes, Matt. 24:45—51. Luke 12:35—46. Jam. 5:9—11. 2 Pet. 3:10—16.) We should therefore carefully judge ourselves, both as to our state and conduct; that our confession of Christ may at that solemn and important season be proved genuine, by the fruits of our grateful love, and devoted obedience to him.

V. 13—23. While we shun superstitious scruples, and assert our Christian liberty, let us beware of spiritual pride and self-preference: and while we pity such as are yet harassed with groundless scruples, and held in bondage to uncommanded observances, let us be careful not to abuse our liberty, by an inexpedient use of things lawful, or by venturing upon such as are doubtful. Let us in all things consider what effects our conduct and example may have on others: and, though it may not be proper in every case to humour the scrupulosity of some persons; yet, when there is a probability of grieving, offending, or turning aside a weak believer, or of stumbling a hopeful inquirer; we should wave our liberty, if nothing of far more importance than our own indulgence, call for the exercise of it. For surely, it cannot be an imitation of the love of Christ, who died for the weak as well as the strong, if we put any personal satisfaction, in competition with the spiritual good of our brethren. Verily it must be confessed that we are often very criminal in such matters; and thus our "good comes to be evil spoken of," because we use lawful things in an uncharitable and selfish manner. But let us remember that both the comforts and the obedience of the gospel are alike superior to meats and drinks; and that both unite in "righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost;" and that, when we most highly value these spiritual privileges, and abound in these spiritual duties, we enjoy the greatest assurance that we are accepted by God, and best approve ourselves before men to be real believers. Let us then follow after all those things, which tend to peace and mutual edification; let us study a holy indifference about the most lawful earthly enjoyments; and learn to renounce whatever comes in competition with the welfare of our brethren, the peace of the church, and the glory of God. Let us pray for deeper humility, and increasing promptitude in self-denial, that we may more regard our acceptance with God, and less desire the applause of men.—In every doubtful or indifferent matter, "happy is he, who condemneth not himself in the thing which he alloweth." Numbers venture into places, and upon actions, against which their own consciences revolt: because they are induced by inclination; or emboldened by the example of those, who on some account have obtained the reputation of pious men. But whether the things themselves be lawful or not; as they cannot "do them in faith," as they hesitate concerning the lawfulness of them, and as they cannot heartily pray for the presence and blessing of God in them; they are condemned for indulging themselves in a doubtful case. But few are so happy, as to be quite free from self-condemnation in every thing which they allow; a sound judgment, a simple heart, a tender conscience, and habitual self-denial, are necessary for the enjoyment of this comfort: and most of us see frequent cause to condemn ourselves in this respect, and, by daily repentance, faith, and prayer, to deprecate the merited condemnation of our God. (Notes, 1 Cor. 6:12—17. 8:7—13. 10:23—28. 1 John 3:18—24.)

NOTES.—Chap. XV. V. 1—3. The apostle here proceeds with the argument of the preceding chapter. He admits that those who knew their liberty, in respect of the distinctions of meats and days, were generally "strong" in faith, as well as sound in judgment, compared with their more scrupulous brethren. But, for that reason, those "who were strong," ought not only to "bear with the infirmities of the weak," who were not able to rise superior to them; and not to despise them: but even to bear their infirmities, by patiently submitting to self-denial on their account, and meekly enduring their uncharitable censures; while they persevered in endeavours to promote their welfare, and to maintain a peaceful communion with them. They should act as those who travel in a company; when those, who are strong and healthy, pay peculiar attention to the sick and feeble, carrying their burdens, waiting for them, and inviting them to lean upon their arms. So that, instead of pleasing and gratifying themselves, in the indulgent use of their liberty, or giving way to pride, self-will, or resentment; they ought readily to recede from their own inclinations, in order to "please their neighbour," as far as could conduce to his good, or to mutual edification, by obviating his prejudices and gaining upon his affections. (Marg. Ref. a—d. Note, Gal. 6:1—5.) Thus Christ, from love to sinners, renounced his own ease, comfort, and reputation: (Marg. Ref. e. Notes, Matt. 20:24—28. John 13:12—17. Phil. 2:5—8.) exposed himself to the reproach and revilings of the enemies of God; and lived, in this polluted miserable world, exposed to contempt, calumnies, and persecutions, till he finished his sufferings by

8 Now [r]I say that [s]Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision [t]for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers:

9 And [u]that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy; as it is written, [x]For this cause I will confess to thee among the Gentiles, and sing unto thy name.

10 And again he saith, [y]Rejoice, ye Gentiles, with his people.

11 And again, [z]Praise the Lord, all ye Gentiles; and laud him, all ye people.

12 And again Esaias saith, [a]There shall be a root of Jesse, [b]and he that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles; [c]in him shall the Gentiles trust.

13 Now [d]the God of hope [e]fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may [f]abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost.

14 [g]And [g]I myself also am persuaded of you, my brethren, that ye also are [h]full of goodness, filled with all knowledge, [i]able also to admonish one another.

15 Nevertheless, brethren, [k]I have written the more boldly unto you in some sort, [l]as putting you in mind, [m]because of the grace that is given to me of God,

16 That [n]I should be the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, [o]ministering the gospel of God, that [p]the [q]offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable, [q]being sanctified by the Holy Ghost.

17 I have therefore [r]whereof I may glory

V. 4—7. The apostle took occasion from the preceding quotation, to remind the Christians at Rome, that the whole of the ancient Scriptures had been written for "their instruction," as much as for that of those to whom they were first delivered: whether they contained types and predictions of Christ, or gracious promises, precepts, admonitions, or examples: in order that, by patiently cleaving to the Lord in faith and holy obedience, amidst all their trials and temptations; and by taking comfort from the daily perusal of the Scriptures; they might possess a joyful hope of heaven, notwithstanding past sins and present manifold defects, as well as many and grievous trials. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Notes, 1 Cor. 10:11,12. 2 Tim. 3:14—17. Heb. 6:16—20. 13:5,6. 2 Pet. 1:19—21.) He therefore prayed for them, to the "God of patience and consolation," who is infinitely patient and long-suffering towards men, who commands them in like manner to bear with one another, and who is the Author and Giver of patience and persevering constancy in well-doing to his people, and the Source of all their consolations, that he would render his exhortations effectual; and grant them to be of one judgment and one heart, disposed to entire harmony and affection, and full of disinterested love and compassion for each other, after the example of Christ, and according to his commands. That so nothing might hinder them from joining, as "with one mind and one mouth," in the worship of God, in glorifying him for his mercies, and adoring his perfections, as "the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ;" who is approached by sinners, through his beloved Son, and is become their reconciled Father in him. And he again exhorted them to lay aside prejudices and disputes, and to receive one another as brethren, without regarding the distinctions of Jew and Gentile, or differences of opinion on subordinate matters: even as Christ had received them, without making exceptions to any of them; that God might be glorified in their salvation, as he would also be in their mutual love and harmony. V. 8—13. In order to unite Jews and Gentiles in one church, and conciliate them to each other, Jesus Christ assumed his human nature among the Jews; he was "made under the law," and was circumcised: and he exercised his personal ministry with unwearied labour and self-denial among circumcised persons; and he commanded his apostles to preach the gospel to the Jews, in the first place. Thus he fulfilled the predictions and promises, delivered to the fathers of that nation: the Gentile converts could therefore have no plausible excuse for despising them. (Marg. Ref. r—t. Notes, 9:4,5. Matt. 15:25—28. Luke 1:46—55,67—79. 24: 44—49. Acts 3:24—26. Eph. 2:14—18.)—On the other hand, after the ascension of Christ, the gospel had, by his command, been extensively preached among the Gentiles, and with very great success; that they also might "glorify God for his mercy," as it had been expressly predicted by several of the ancient prophets. (Marg. Ref. u—c. Notes, Deut. 32:43. Ps. 18:49. 117. Is. 11:10.) So that the Jewish converts could have no reason to exclude or shun the Gentiles, whether they regarded the will of their ascended Lord, or the prophecies of the Scripture. Indeed Isaiah had expressly stated, that the Gentiles would trust, or hope, in that Messiah, who should arise to reign over them: (Notes, Eph. 1:9 —14. 1 Pet. 1:17—21.) and hence the apostle took occasion to pray, that God, the Author and Object of hope, would fill them with abundance of all spiritual joy and peace, by enabling them simply to believe in him, as revealed in his beloved Son, and relying on his gracious promises; that so they might attain to an assured, abiding, realizing, and anticipating hope of eternal life, through the sanctifying and comforting energy of the Holy Spirit. (Marg. Ref. d—f. Notes, 5:1— 5. Gal. 5:22—26. 2 Thes. 2:16,17.)—Rejoice, &c. (10) 'The Hebrew interpreters render the original, (Deut. 32:43.) "Celebrate, O ye nations, his people." . . . Certainly the nations could not cordially extol the people as happy and blessed; unless, affected with their felicity, they acknowledged and worshipped the same God. . . . V. 14—17. The apostle, being about to conclude his epistle, shows the Romans on what grounds he, who had never seen them, had been induced to address them in so earnest and copious a manner. This did not arise from any doubt that he entertained concerning them: for he was persuaded that they were so replete with the "goodness," tha through Jesus Christ, [s]it those things which pertain to God.

18 For [t]I will not dare to speak of any of those things [u]which Christ hath not wrought by me, [x]to make the Gentiles obedient, [y]by word and deed, 19 Through [z]mighty signs and wonders, [a]by the power of the Spirit of God; [b]so that from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum, I have [c]fully preached the gospel of Christ.

20 Yea, [d]so have I strived to preach the gospel, not where Christ was named, lest I should [e]build upon another man's foundation:

21 But as it is written, [f]To whom he was not spoken of, they shall see: and they that have not heard shall understand. [Practical Observations.]

22 For which cause also [g]I have been [*]much hindered from coming to you.

23 But now having no more place in these parts, [h]and having a great desire these many years to come unto you;

24 Whensoever [i]I take my journey into Spain, I will come to you: for I trust to see you in my journey, [k]and to be brought on my way thitherward by you, [l]if first I be somewhat filled [†]with your company.

25 But now [m]I go unto Jerusalem to minister unto the saints.

26 For [n]it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia to make a certain contribution for [o]the poor saints which are at Jerusalem.

27 It hath pleased them verily; [p]and their debtors they are. For if the Gentiles have been made partakers of their spiritual things, their duty is also to minister unto them in carnal things.

28 When therefore I have performed this, [q]and have sealed to them this fruit, [r]I will come by you [‡]into Spain.

29 And I am sure that when I come unto you, I shall come [s]in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ.

kind and affectionate spirit, which he had inculcated, as well as with knowledge in every part of the gospel, as to be able to "admonish one another," without other assistance. Nevertheless he had written with the more confidence to them, on several most important subjects, to put them in remembrance of their duties and their dangers; (Note, 2 Pet. 1:12—15.) because God had peculiarly favoured him, in appointing him to be the apostle and the minister of Christ to the Gentiles. (Marg. Ref. g—l. Notes, 1:5—7. 11:11—15. Acts 9:15,16. Gal. 2:6—10. Eph. 3:8.) His special ministry required him to preach the gospel among the Gentiles in general, and to superintend their affairs, (as the priest among the Jews used to do the sacrifice, or the burning of incense,) in order that their persons and services might be presented to God in an acceptable manner, by the hands of the great High-Priest within the veil, being sanctified by the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit; and he therefore thought himself called on to attempt this service towards them also. (Marg. Ref. m—q. Notes, 12:1. Is. 66:19—23. Phil. 2:14—18.) For in this important trust he had some ground of glorying; not in himself, but in the unmerited and rich favour of Jesus Christ towards him; not in carnal things, but in those which pertained to God and his worship. V. 18—21. The apostle's success had corresponded to the importance of the trust delegated to him. He would not dare to speak of what "Christ had not wrought by him," in bringing the heathen nations to obey the truth, "by word and deed." It seems that some teachers were forward to do this: but he would not venture to do himself, what he condemned as folly and sin in other men. (Marg. Ref. t—x. Notes, 2 Cor. 10:12—16.) What had been done was entirely the work of Christ; but he had chosen to make use of him as his instrument. "Christ hath wrought by me." (Notes, Mark 6:19,20. Acts 15:12. 1 Cor. 3:4—9.) In other places it is said, "God wrought by him:" here "Christ wrought by him." His preaching had been attended with extraordinary miracles, wrought "by the power of the Holy Spirit," whose divine agency had also disposed the hearts of the hearers to embrace the gospel. So that from Jerusalem, in a very extensive circle of several thousands of miles, even to Illyricum on the borders of Italy, he "had fully preached the gospel of Christ," and instructed large multitudes, with great accuracy in that holy doctrine. (Marg. Ref. z—c.) Indeed it had been his ambition to carry the glad tidings of salvation to those, who had not before heard of Christ; and thus to face the dangers and hardships of making the first assault on the kingdom of Satan, in every place. Nor was he disposed, in general, to "build on the foundation" laid by other ministers, who were competent to carry on the work which they had happily begun; but rather to fulfil the Scripture, which foretold, that many nations and rulers would see and understand those things, which they had before been strangers to. (Notes, Is. 52:13—15. 1 Cor. 3:10—15.)—'Probably, in mentioning this, he may glance on those false apostles, who crept into churches which he had planted, and endeavoured to establish their own reputation and influence there, by alienating the hearts of his own converts from him, their spiritual father: while, like some in our own days, ... they built on his grand and noble foundation, an edifice of wood, and hay, and stubble. 1 Cor. 3:12.' Doddridge.—By word and deed. (18) 'By the manner in which he hath enabled me to speak, and the things which he hath strengthened me to perform.' Ibid. As there is no preposition in the Greek, the clause may be rendered, "In word and deed," and applied, as above, to the obedience of the Gentiles: and this seems better to accord with the general language of Scripture. (Marg. Ref. y.)—Unto Illyricum. (19) 'I do not think, that these words necessarily import, that St. Paul had penetrated into Illyricum; ... but rather that he had come to the confines of Illyricum; and that these confines were the external boundary of his travels. ... Illyricum adjoins unto Macedonia; measuring from Jerusalem towards Rome, it lies close behind it. If therefore St. Paul traversed the whole country of Macedonia, the route would necessarily bring him to the confines of Illyricum. Now the account of St. Paul's second visit to the peninsula of Greece is contained in these words. "He departed for to go into Macedonia, and when he had gone over those parts, and had given them much exhortation, he came into Greece." This account allows, or rather leads us to suppose, that St. Paul, in going over Macedonia, ... had passed so far to the west, as to come into those parts of the country, which were contiguous to Illyricum, if he did not enter into Illyricum itself. The history and the epistle therefore so far agree; and the agreement is much strengthened by a coincidence of time. At the time when this epistle was written, St. Paul might say, in conformity to the history, that he had come unto Illyricum: much before this time he could not have said so; for upon his former journey into Macedonia, his route is laid down, from the time of his landing at Philippi, to his sailing from Corinth; ... which confines him to the eastern side of the peninsula, and therefore keeps him all the while at a considerable distance from Illyricum.' Paley.—To whom he, &c. V. 22—29. As the Romans were already favoured with the gospel, it did not accord with the apostle's plan to leave his more urgent employment to go among them: and this, with other reasons, had long "hindered" him from visiting them. But, as he had now brought the churches which he had planted, to establishment in the faith; and as he had no immediate call to any new scene of action, in the parts where he had before laboured; so he purposed to gratify the strong desire, which he had for many years experienced, of going to Rome. (Marg. Ref. g, h. Note, 1:8—15.) But he also purposed a journey into Spain, a large country still much further to the west, where probably the gospel had not at that time been preached. In his way he designed to stay for a time at Rome: and when he had in part satisfied his affectionate desire of communing with the believers there, he expected they would help him forward toward Spain.—' "In some degree:" for I know, that if I were to indulge my own affection for you, my visit would be much longer than the views of duty elsewhere will permit.' Doddridge. (Marg. and Marg. Ref. i—i.) But, in the mean time, he must take a long journey in the opposite direction, in order to perform an important service to the poor Christians at Jerusalem, for whom the Gentile converts had raised a liberal contribution. (Marg. Ref. m—o. Notes, Acts 24:10—21. 1 Cor. 16:1,2. 2 Cor. 8:9.) This they had done willingly: but indeed they were "debtors to them" to a very great amount. For the Jewish preachers had first carried the gospel among them; and the primitive believers at Jersusalem had impoverished themselves in promoting that doctrine, the blessing of which they now shared with the Gentiles. (Notes, Acts 2:44—47. 4:32—37. 11:27—30.) It was, therefore, the bounden duty of the Gentile converts to communicate to the Jewish Christians of their temporal abundance. (Note, 2 Cor. 9:6—12.) When therefore he had performed this service, and had affixed his seal, as it were, to this good fruit produced by the Gentiles, in order to conciliate the minds of their Jewish brethren; he intended to pass by Rome to Spain. (Marg. Ref. s.) And whenever he should be permitted to come to them, he knew, and was confident, that he should be employed to communicate to them an abundant supply of those spiritual gifts, consolations, and blessings, which are conveyed to sinners by "the gospel of Christ:" so that they would certainly be edified, established, comforted, and increased in numbers, by his coming, his preaching, and the miraculous powers which he should be employed to impart to them. (Marg. Ref. s.)—Thus the apostle never lost sight of his object, or let slip any opportunity of inculcating mutual love between the Jewish and Gentile converts.—It is not known, whether the apostle ever accomplished his intended journey into Spain. But as Clement, writing from Rome, in the first century, said that he preached ... 'to the utmost bounds of the west;' it is most probable that he did. He, however, went to Rome in a far different manner than he had proposed. (Notes, Acts 21:28:)—I go unto Jerusalem. (25.) 'Here at length ... but fetched from three different writings, we have obtained the several circumstances, ... which the epistle to the Romans brings together; viz. a contribution in Achaia for the Christians at Jerusalem; a contribution in Macedonia for the same purpose; and an approaching journey of St. Paul to Jerusalem. We have these circumstances, each by some hint in the passage in which it is mentioned, or by the date of the writing in which the passage occurs, fixed to a particular time; and we have that time, turning out, upon examination, to be in all the same; namely, towards the close of St. Paul's second visit to the peninsula of Greece.' Paley.—This fixes the writing of this epistle to a particular part of the narrative of the apostle's labours: but there is some difficulty, in determining in what year those events took place. Some date them A. D. 58, others A. D. 60, or 61.

V. 30—33. The apostle regarded his journey to Jerusalem as of so much importance, that he ought not to decline it: yet he was fully aware, that it would be attended with great danger and difficulty, through the enmity of the Jews, and the strong prejudices even of the Christians in Judea against him; which neither his zeal in their behalf, nor the liberality of the Gentile converts could counterbalance. (Notes, Acts 19:21,22. 20:1—6,22—24. 21:7—26.) He therefore besought the Romans, "for the sake of Christ" their common Lord, and for that love's sake which the Spirit of Christ had wrought in their hearts to each other, (according to his own most loving manner and conduct towards them,) earnestly to unite in prayers for him, that he might be protected from the malice of the unbelieving or disobedient Jews, who would otherwise disappoint all the plans which he had formed; and that the prejudices of the Jewish believers might be so removed, that they might accept and take in good part the service which he went to perform. (Marg. Ref. t—a.) That so, if the Lord pleased, he might come to them, not grieved and disappointed, but "with joy" and comfort: and also that his spirit might be refreshed and enlivened by joining with them in thanksgivings to God, and by what he witnessed of the grace bestowed upon them. In the mean time he prayed, that "the God of peace" as reconciled to believers in Christ, and as disposing them to live together in peace and harmony, might be with them all, for their comfort, and to prevent all disputes and divisions among themselves. (Marg. Ref. b—d. Notes, 16:17—20. 2 Tim. 4:22. Heb. 13:20,21.) 'If Paul, saith Esthius, might desire the prayers of the Romans, why might not the Romans desire the prayers of Paul? I answer they might desire his prayers, as he did theirs, by a letter directed to him to pray for them. He adds, If they might desire his prayers for them when living, why not when dead, and reigning with Christ? I answer, Because they could direct no epistle to him, or in any other way acquaint him with their mind.' Whitby.—Love of the Spirit. (30) This may denote the love of the Holy Spirit shown to us, in quickening, sanctifying, and comforting us. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7. The powerful of this world often domineer over the weak, but it ought not to be so in the church of Christ: (Notes, Matt. 20:24—28. Luke 22:24—27.) on the contrary, every one, in proportion as he is strong in faith and grace, should be tender, patient, and compassionate to the feeble-minded, to those "who are compassed with infirmities;" perplexed in their views; harassed with scruples, doubts, and temptations; and unable to enjoy the peace and comfort of the gospel, while they appear to walk in the obedience of it. Even if their infirmities be attended with a degree of bigotry, censoriousness, or peevishness; we ought still to bear with them and pity them, and submit to self-denial for their good: and, instead of "pleasing ourselves," whatever may become of them, we ought to give up our own humour and inclination, as far as we can "please them for their good unto edification;" though we must not be men-pleasers, or help to deceive them by our flatteries and compliances.—If any man deem himself "strong," and he be at the same time disposed to revile, despise, condemn, and reject the weak and scrupulous, because they cannot accede to his whole system: it is evident that pride and selfishness are stronger in his heart, than faith and grace; and that he has more of "the knowledge that puffeth up," than of the "love that edifieth;" or, of "the wisdom which is from above." (Notes, 1 Cor. 8:1—3. 13:4—7. Jam. 3:13—18.) He is the most advanced Christian, who is most conformed to Christ, and most willing to renounce his own ease or indulgence, and to endure reproach and suffering, after his example, and in prosecution of that great design for which he shed his blood: and if, in doing this, he be reviled by zealots and uncharitable bigots, he may with humble accommodation use the Redeemer's words: "the reproaches of them that reproached thee, are fallen upon me." For whatever is written, either in the Old or the New Testament, is intended for our instruction, and may be applied to our case, for direction and encouragement; that, by patient faith, persevering obedience, and comfort derived from the word of God, 'we may embrace, and ever hold fast, the blessed hope of everlasting life, as given to us in Jesus Christ.' Thus relying on the mercy and truth of "the God of all patience and consolation;" we should pray continually, that we, and our brethren in Christ, may be "like minded towards one another" after his example; that the divisions of the church being healed, all who are called by his name "may glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jesus, with one mind and with one mouth." And till this perfect union shall be effected, we should learn to agree, notwithstanding our differences about non-essentials; and to receive one another as brethren, while we hold the great doctrines of salvation for sinners, by the blood and Spirit of Christ; for this will tend greatly to the credit of the gospel, and the glory of God.

V. 8—21. The whole plan of redemption is so formed, that it is suited to reconcile us to one another, as well as to our gracious God, and we may say of every contention among Christians, "An enemy hath done this."—The fulfilment of ancient promises and prophecies, in the coming of Christ among the Jews, and in the great success of the gospel among the Gentiles, and through distant nations and languages, that they might "glorify God for his mercy," and hope in that "Branch from the Root of Jesse," who was raised up to reign over them; should teach us "sinners of the Gentiles" especially to cease from our murmurings and disputings, and to join in grateful praises and thanksgivings to him, who glories in his merciful victories among the heathen, and has called them "to rejoice with his people, Israel." If we would have "the God of hope to fill our hearts with all peace and joy in believing;" (and we can have no abiding holy joy and peace in any other way;) if we would "abound in hope by the power of the Holy Ghost;" we must rely on and pray for the teaching and influences of that divine Agent; and we must be careful neither to grieve him by our evil tempers or sinful passions; nor to quench his sacred fire, by negligence or procrastination: for thus we often bring darkness and disconsolation upon ourselves. (Notes, Eph. 4:30—32. 1 Thes. 5:16—22, v. 19.)—We should also hope the best of others, and commend what is good in their conduct: but those who are really most "full of goodness and knowledge, and able to admonish one another," will be most thankful to be reminded of their duty, and cautioned against danger, by those who are authorised to watch over them; who have "obtained grace to be faithful" in their ministry; and who evidently desire, that the persons and services of their brethren may be "acceptable to God through Jesus Christ, being sanctified by the Holy Spirit."—It is indeed an honour to be employed by the Lord Jesus, and for him to "work by us in those things which pertain to God," and in rendering sinners "obedient in word and deed." But the whole glory must ultimately be referred to him: ostentation should carefully be avoided in speaking on such subjects; and it is seldom expedient to mention ourselves, except as we want to obviate men's prejudices against our ministry, when they impede our usefulness.—But indeed, how trivial are the labours, and how limited is the usefulness, of most of us, when compared with those of the apostle, whose ministry was attended "with the power of the Holy Ghost" in so remarkable a degree, and whose unwearied labours would admit of no bounds but those of the human species, or of his own life!—It is honourable, when ministers, who have the opportunity, boldly face opposition and hardship in carrying the gospel to those places, where "Christ hath not yet been named;" and when they would rather make irruptions into the uninvaded provinces of Satan's dark domain, than more securely garrison such as have already been torn from him. This is a noble ambition: and in this the genuine missionary far more resembles the apostle, than any stated pastor or ruler of the church can do. He is the hero, the most honourable warrior under the banner of Christ, and should be assisted and honoured accordingly. But as most of us must, in some measure, "build upon the foundation" that others have laid before us: we should at least "take heed how we build thereon," that our superstructure may not disgrace or expose the good foundation, as too often is the case.
